The Passion music in Benedict's "St. Peter" was given during Passiontide at St. Matthew's, Sydenham, with orchestral accompaniment, and with Dr. Shinn as organist and Mr. A. M. Hughes as conductor. At Holy Trinity Church, Winnipeg, Canada, Maunder's cantata "Penitence, Pardon, and Peace" was one feature of the season's music. This cantata was also sung at St. Paul's and the City Road Wesleyan Chapel, Chester. Mr. C. Lee Williams's cantata "Gethsemane" was twice given at St. John's Church, St. Leonard's, with Mr. F. O'Connor as organist. Graun's Passion Music was excellently given at St. Saviour's Collegiate Church, Southwark, accompanied by an orchestra under the direction of Mr. C. Williams and with Dr. A. Madeley Richardson at the organ.

Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given at St. Mary of Eton, Victoria Park, by the choir, assisted by the choral society connected with the church, on March 22, under the direction of Mr. D. A. Fox. The cantata was repeated on Monday in Holy Week. The same work was also performed at St. John's, Red Lion Square, on March 24, with Mr. D. A. Fox presiding at the organ; and at St. Barnabas, Kentish Town, on Good Friday evening, when the Rev. A. E. Whish conducted the choir and Mr. George T. Pinches presided at the organ. The "Crucifixion" was also sung during Eastertide at the churches of St. Oswald, St. John, and Holy Trinity, Chester, and at Canterbury Cathedral. On Good Friday afternoon Gounod's "Come near to the Cross" and his "Gallia," together with selections from the Passion music in "The Messiah," were sung in the College Chapel, Dover, with Mr. Stevens at the organ.

Dr. C. W. Pearce's musicianly and thoughtful Easter cantata, set to well arranged text, was given on Easter Day, at the Parish Church, Portsmouth, under the direction of the organist, Mr. R. H. Turner. The music of the season at the Church of the Incarnation, New York, was admirably selected, not only from an artistic point of view, but as regards its scope and breadth, as representing the sacred art of all branches of the Christian Church. The church evidently possesses in its able organist and choirmaster, Mr. W. R. Hedden, a widely read and earnest musician.

At the Cathedral, St. Asaph, a rendering of Bach's Passion music according to "St. Matthew," by a body of eighty voices connected with the choirs in that city, Rhyl, and Denbigh, was recently given with accompaniments, in which a small orchestra took part, under the direction of Dr. Wilson. Another sign of increased musical life in the Church in Wales was the combined rendering of the music, including Beethoven's "Hallelujah" chorus, by the choirs of St. Asaph and Bangor Cathedrals, at the Bishop of Bangor's enthronement, on the 11th ult.

In no part of the country is the support of Sunday schools more consistently upheld than in Lancashire. If it may not be claimed that Sunday school music primarily intended for children is not Church music, it will not be forgotten that it is important to guard and train the musical instincts of children; then a good sign of future development in this connection comes distinctly within the scope of any serious consideration of that large subject, Church music.

At the annual service of the South Liverpool Sunday School Association, held in the great maritime city of the North-West, in Bede's Church, on the 10th ult., a combined choir of one hundred voices took part in the music, in which the children were encouraged to "raise their voices."

ORGAN MUSIC.

A characteristic and interesting programme of organ music, written specially for the instrument by the hand of one master, was the scheme of a selection from the works of Mr. W. T. Best, played at St. Bede's, Liverpool, on a recent Sunday evening, by Mr. E. H. Smith. The mixture of organ and orchestral effects in the music of the late eminent Liverpool organist makes such a selection more judicious than would be the case in dealing with the works of some of those composers who write more strictly for the instrument. On the 23rd ult. a similar selection from the highly effective organ music of M. Guilmant was to be given by the same player. Mr. J. M. Preston's programmes of the past month, played at St. George's, Newcastle-on-Tyne, were good models of judiciously intermingled organ music and transcribed orchestral pieces. The chosen specimens included Dr. Alan Gray's Fantasia on the fine old Church tune "O Filii, et Filiæ"; "Grand chœur dialogué," Gigout; Sonatas by Mendelssohn and Rheinberger; "Rhapsodie Pastorale," Salomé; and the Finale from the Orchestral Suite (Op. 52), Schumann.

At West Bromwich Parish Church, on the 9th ult., Mr. W. A. Roberts gave a recital, the scheme of which included those valuable specimens of Mendelssohn's skill as a composer for the instrument, the posthumous Air with variations in D and Allegro in B flat.

From Canada comes the scheme of four recitals, given at the College Hall, St. John's, Newfoundland, and played by Mr. Le Sueur. The following pieces were included: Nocturne, H. W. Parker; Scherzando in A minor, Otto Dienel; and Fantaisie Pastorale, A. Renaud. Mr. W. E. Fairclough, playing at St. Peter's, Toronto, recently, included in his programme two of Wolstenholme's shorter organ pieces.

At the American Presbyterian Church, Montreal, the list of pieces played recently by Mr. W. Reed, in the course of two recitals, included the following by young English composers: "Grand Chœur," A. Hollins; "Caprice" and "The Answer," Wolstenholme; and also Theme with variations in D, Mendelssohn, and Gigout's Scherzo in E.

At the Parish Church, Strabane, Ireland, recitals have been lately given by the organist, Mr. C. J. Brennan, and his pupil, Miss A. L. H. Olhert. The schemes of the former included Hesse's Toccata in A flat and "Allegretto," A. Thomas. Mr. R. Sharpe's programme, at St. Mary's Church, Southampton, on the 3rd ult., included a Pastorale in F, by G. E. Whiting, and Scherzo in B flat, by W. S. Hoyte. Mr. Herbert W. Jones gave a recital on the 14th ult., at Bothwell Old Parish Church, when his programme contained: "Canzone," Morley; "Invocation," Guilmant; and "Postlude," Lemmens. Mr. H. S. Irons played a good selection of pieces at St. Andrew's, Nottingham, on the 13th ult., his programme including "Grand Chœur in D major," MacMaster; "Berceuse," Delbruck; "Scherzo," S. Rosseau; and "Minuet Symphonique," Salomé. Mr. C. H. Moody, who is moving from Wigan Parish Church to Holy Trinity Church, Coventry, gave a recital at the first-named church on Easter Day. His programme included the now much played Air with variations in D, Mendelssohn; and Neukomm's once popular "Concert on a lake."

During the past Term two organ recitals have been given, by the Rev. C. H. Stevens, in the College Chapel, Dover, comprising selections from the works of Guilmant, Widor, Schumann, Brosig, and Wolstenholme, with other pieces for strings and organ, and vocal solos.

Dr. Varley Roberts was the organist upon the occasion of the opening, on the 8th ult., of a new three-manual organ, built by Messrs. Abbott and Smith for St. Mary's Church, Tuddenham, Manchester. The instrument was the gift of Mr. John Murgatroyd and his two sisters.

The series of organ recitals given at the Royal College of Organists, under the auspices of Dr. J. Warriner, terminated recently. Twelve performances were given by players of recognised position, and the programmes were quite models of artistic judgment. The last two performances were played by Drs. Harding and Abernethy respectively. That it may be possible to resume the recitals another season will be the hope of not a few lovers of good organ music.

MR. ELGAR'S "CARACTACUS" AT THE ALBERT HALL.

THE performance, by the Royal Choral Society, on the 20th ult., of Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata "Caractacus" was an emphatic success. The work was written for and produced at the Leeds Festival on October 5 last, when it was recognised as a composition of remarkable imaginative power and mastery of technical resource, particularly in the suggestive interweaving of Leitmotiven and in telling orchestration. These qualities cause repeated hearing of the work to increase interest in, and esteem for the music. To the large majority of those present on this occasion the cantata must have been entirely new, for its only previous performance in London was that of the Highbury Philharmonic Society, on November 29 last, and it says much for the inspiration and breadth of Mr. Elgar's music that number after number aroused enthusiastic applause. As at Leeds, the most appreciated portions were the vivid and weird scene in the forest, the impassioned duet of the lovers, the beautiful and pathetic "lament" of the King, the dramatic processional march, and the fine peroration, which sends the listener away with a haunting strain and a pulse stirred by patriotic words. The parts of the King, Orbin, and Eigen were severally sustained, as at Leeds, by Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Madame Medora Henson, all of whom sang magnificently. Mr. Douglas Powell also sang excellently in the triple rôles of the Arch-Druid, the Roman Emperor, and a Bard, and the choristers manifestly had their hearts in their work and followed the clear and sweeping beat of the composer with unremitting attention and implicit obedience. The orchestra also worked well, and Mr. H. L. Balfour rendered judicious and skilful assistance at the organ. At the conclusion Mr. Elgar was heartily cheered and twice recalled to the platform.

The second part of the programme was occupied by the admirably revised version of Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," which, under the conductorship of Sir Frederick Bridge, satisfactorily concluded a memorable evening.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERT.

M. RACHMANINOV'S FANTASIA IN E FOR ORCHESTRA (OP. 7).

M. RACHMANINOV made his first appearance on an English platform at the Queen's Hall, at the Philharmonic concert, on the 19th ult. British hospitality exhibited itself in prolonged applause before he raised the baton to conduct his Fantasia in E, in twice recalling him after he had laid it down, and in insisting upon his repeating his clever Prelude in C sharp minor for the pianoforte. He doubtless, therefore, was satisfied with his reception; but it is doubtful if he gave a like feeling to the majority of his listeners. Truth to tell, the Fantasia is little more than a study in orchestral effects. These are amazingly clever, some quite new, others charming or startling, occasionally impressive as mere combinations of timbre, and the whole dazzling like the flashes from a brilliant gem. Little fault, too, can be found with the form. The six sections are well balanced and contrasted. But here admiration ceases. The themes are small and ill nourished. Nearly all creep about in apologetic half-tones. They never grow to anything, and their gorgeous Byzantine apparel accentuates their want of distinction. M. Rachmaninov, however, is barely twenty-five, and with such masterly grip of the orchestra great things may be hoped from his pen. Another Russian piece also proved disappointing. This was the recitation and cavatina "Lentement baisse le jour," from Borodine's opera "Prince Igor." It, moreover, seemed unsuited to Mdlle. Christianne Andray's vocal means. The other orchestral works were Mr. Luard Selby's "Idyll" for small orchestra and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor. The latter received a thoroughly masculine interpretation under the direction of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who also conducted the former. Although no line was vouchsafed to Mr. Selby's work in the analytical programme, it certainly deserved comment. It was originally produced at one of Mr Henschel's concerts at St. James's Hall, on March 11, 1897, and is a work that leaves agreeable recollections.

THE BACH CHOIR.

VERDI'S "Stabat Mater," first performed in England at last year's Gloucester Festival, opened the concert given on March 25 by the Bach Choir, at the Queen's Hall. The choral portion was intelligently sung, though scarcely with the fervour of expression the music demands. It was followed by Brahms's second Pianoforte Concerto in B flat (Op. 83), Mr Leonard Borwick playing the solo part with great brilliancy. The second half of the evening was devoted to Sir Hubert Parry's setting of scenes from Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound," which was originally produced at the Gloucester Festival of 1880, and was performed, for the first time in London, by the Bach Choir, on February 19, 1885. For the performance on Lady-day last the composer had revised his work, but the alterations proved to be few. Renewed acquaintance with the composition leaves a sense of the undeveloped power of its composer. Several of the numbers are ineffective owing to lack of experience of the best means to an end, but loftiness of conception and aim is always apparent and much of the writing is noble and beautiful music; notably the chorus, "Thrice three-hundred-thousand years," the orchestral interlude preceding the chorus of spirits, and the chorus itself. The choir sang with commendable precision, and the solos were effectively rendered by Miss Ethel Wood, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford. The orchestral playing throughout the evening was rough and unfinished. Professor Villiers Stanford surrendered the baton to Sir Hubert Parry in the second part of the programme.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

MR. W. H. BELL'S "PARDONER'S TALE."

THE production of novelties and revivals of neglected works have continued to be the chief feature of the Saturday afternoon concerts at the Crystal Palace. On March 25 Mr. Frederick Cliffe's fine Symphony in C, originally produced at these concerts on April 20, 1889, was, after an interval of ten years, played for the third time. It was warmly received and the composer answered a call to the platform. In the course of another ten years music-lovers of sanguine temperament may hope to hear it once again at the Queen's Hall. The new work by Mr. William Henry Bell was a symphonic poem based upon "The Pardoner's Tale," from Chaucer's "Canterbury Tales." The story, it may be well to remind our readers, concerns three drunken revellers who, finding a hidden treasure, send their youngest companion to get some wine and arrange to kill him on his return. This they do, but shortly afterwards die themselves from the wine which their promising disciple had provided. When a composer selects so sordid a subject he can scarcely hope that his music will be agreeable to hear, or ennobling—that is, if he has the power to in anywise express the spirit of the text. Mr. Bell has that power, for he is not only gifted, but is an accomplished craftsman of his art, and consequently his symphonic poem, although containing impressive passages, is, in its entirety, not music that one yearns to listen to a second time. This want of perception of what is suitable for musical treatment is a common failing amongst composers of to-day. The work was excellently interpreted, and its cleverness was so appreciated by the audience that Mr. Bell had twice to acknowledge the prolonged applause.

MR. OTTO MANNS'S SCHERZO CAPRICCIOSO.

The novelty at the concert on the 8th ult. was a Scherzo Capriccioso in D for orchestra, by Mr. Otto Manns, jun., a nephew of the esteemed conductor of these concerts and principal viola player in the Sydenham orchestra. He was born in 1873 at Dresden, where he received his musical training. The work consists of an Introduction, scherzo, two trios, and coda. The themes show lively fancy and inventiveness, and although the scoring gives evidence of the influence of Wagner and Liszt, it testifies to considerable skill and knowledge of effect, and in its entirety is decidedly a composition of promise It was conducted by the composer and was favourably received.

Other noteworthy performances were a fine interpretation of Beethoven's Fifth Symphony in C minor, and the restrained playing of M. Sapellnikoff in M. Saint-Saëns's second Pianoforte Concerto in G minor.

MADAME LIZA LEHMANN'S "YOUNG LOCHINVAR."

When a composer writes so remarkably clever a work as Madame Lehmann's song cycle "In a Persian Garden," other compositions from the same pen are apt to be judged by the same standard; and thus some disappointment was experienced with this lady's setting of Sir Walter Scott's poem "Young Lochinvar," which was performed at the concert on the 22nd ult. It was sung from a revised version, which, however, might still be improved, especially towards the end where the baritone solo part is rendered inaudible by being accompanied fortissimo by the full choir. The chief themes are melodious, but the romantic and robust spirit of the text is weakly reflected in the music. Unfortunately, also, the choir frequently showed such hesitancy in attack and want of precision in the delivery of the words that the setting sounded less effective than it otherwise would have done. Better results were secured in Professor Stanford's choral ballad "Phaudrig Crohoore" (Op. 62), but many points in this were missed. More pleasure-giving as a performance was Miss Gertrude Peppercorn's pianoforte playing in Rubinstein's fourth Concerto in D minor (Op. 70). This young pianist is a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music. Her attack is firm and crisp, her execution fluent and brilliant, and, what is of more value than these acquirements, her touch is sympathetic and her style indicative of an artistic temperament. The solo vocalists were Miss Susan Strong and Mr. Kennerley Rumford.

THE BRISTOL CHORAL SOCIETY.

The visit of the Bristol Choral Society to the Queen's Hall, on the 15th ult., was certainly a noteworthy event of the present season. Under the direction of Mr. Riseley this body has worthily attained the reputation of being one of the finest choirs in England—a reputation that was well sustained on this occasion. The basses are somewhat deficient in resonance, and the tenors lack brilliancy in a measurable degree; but the contralto voices are very rich in quality, and the sopranos combine power and beauty of tone, and especially phrasing, in a very remarkable degree. In enthusiasm, attack, precision, and shading, a very high standard was attained. The interpretation of Brahms's noble "Requiem" was certainly one of the finest that has been given in the Metropolis. The choir, however, was probably most appreciated in Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which was beautifully rendered. The soloists were Madame Ella Russell, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. Andrew Black, while Miss Stanley Lucas did exceedingly well in "I waited for the Lord." Mr. Riseley conducted with enthusiasm and a rhythmic force that was quite exhilarating.

GOOD FRIDAY CONCERTS.

For several years concerts on Good Friday have been steadily increasing, and those given on March 31 far exceeded precedent. It is satisfactory to be able to add that the supply of sacred concerts did not prove beyond the demand.

At the Crystal Palace, as usual, a selection from "The Redemption," some hymns (in which the audience were invited to join), and airs from oratorios were given under the conductorship of Mr. Manns. The soloists were Mesdames Ella Russell, Clara Butt, Marian McKenzie, and Esther Palliser, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Santley.

Sir Frederick Bridge presided over the Royal Choral Society's performance, at the Albert Hall, of "The Messiah," Mozart's accompaniments being dispensed with, as was the case at the beginning of the year. Miss Esther Palliser, Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the principals, and the choir did its share in contributing towards a satisfactory rendering.

An abbreviated version of "The Messiah" was also given at the Alexandra Palace, under Mr. George Riseley, who had at command an efficient chorus and band, together with able soloists in Mesdames Duma and Belle Cole, Messrs. Herbert Grover and Charles Copland.

Mr. Newman held two concerts at Queen's Hall, that in the afternoon being mainly instrumental, with Tschaïkowsky's Pathetic Symphony as the central feature, whilst in the evening there was a liberal programme of sacred airs, in which Mesdames Ella Russell, Hilda Wilson, Belle Cole, and other popular artists took part.

There were also two concerts at St. James's Hall. Mr. Vert offered a miscellaneous programme in the afternoon, and Mr. Ambrose Austin in the evening gave Rossini's "Stabat Mater" (principals, Misses Alice Esty and Clara Butt, Messrs. Edward Lloyd and Andrew Black) and a number of airs and choruses from various sources. The South London Choral Association formed the chorus.

At the Alhambra the National Sunday League provided a vocal and orchestral selection in the afternoon and Rossini's "Stabat Mater" in the evening. Among other performances were those of "The Messiah" at the Bow and Bromley Institute (under Dr. W. G. McNaught) and at the People's Palace, Mile End Road (conductor, Mr. C. H. Allen Gill).

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND.

The most substantial feature of the concert at Queen's Hall, on the 14th ult., was Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony. All the chief points were effectively brought out and the strictest regard for expression was observed. Again one of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsodies—this time the fourth—figured in the programme, and once more the peculiar spirit of these compositions was faithfully reflected. Correspondingly excellent were the performances of Saint-Saëns's picturesque "Algérienne" Suite and Mr. John E. West's stirring march, "Victoria! our Queen," and for a spirited final item there was the Overture to Goldmark's "Das Heimchen am Herd." Cavalière L. Zavertal conducted with his usual skill.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL SOCIETIES.

The Stock Exchange Orchestral and Choral Society gave its third subscription concert on the 10th ult., at the Queen's Hall, when, under the able conductorship of Mr. Arthur W. Payne, praiseworthy performances were given of Mendelssohn's Third Symphony, Sterndale Bennett's Overture "The Naiads," and Bizet's "L'Arlesienne" Suite. The choral music, which was admirably rendered under the direction of Mr. Munro Davison, consisted of the anthem "O Lord the Maker of all things," attributed to Henry VIII.; a tasteful glee entitled "The Lay of the Fancy Fair," written and composed by Mr. Davison; Franz Abt's part-song "The grave of the singer"; another entitled "The Retreat," by De Rille; and Beale's madrigal "What ho!" Mr. Herbert Fryer was heard in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 16) and Miss Grainger Kerr contributed three songs.

MR. R. H. WALTHEW'S INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO "ALADDIN" AND BIZET'S "PATRIE" OVERTURE.

The programme of the fourth concert given by the Strolling Players, on the 20th ult., at the Queen's Hall, was of a commendably unhackneyed character, and included a selection consisting of the overture and two entr'actes from Mr. R. H. Walthew's incidental music to a children's play entitled "Aladdin," which some friends of the composer arranged for a Christmas entertainment. This music is naturally unpretentious, but it is very dainty and pleasing, and now and again humorous touches increase its brightness and individuality. It should be heard again, for good light music is not too plentiful, and its composition should be encouraged. Another attractive work, probably new to London, although it was produced at Paris in 1874, at one of the popular concerts directed by Pasdeloup, was Bizet's dramatic concert-overture entitled "Patrie." This is a bright and vivid composition, concluding in a stirring manner suggestive of a song of triumph. Other little known works were Theodore Gouvy's Second Symphony in F (Op. 12) and the march from Victor Nessler's "Rattenfänger von Hameln." The vocalists were Misses Jeanne and Louise Douste and Mr. Norman Salmond. Mr. Norfolk Megone conducted, as usual.

NEW MUSIC FOR WIND INSTRUMENTS.

First performances in England were given, on the 17th ult., of two works worthy of note at Mr. Fransella's second chamber concert at the Queen's (Small) Hall. The first brought forward was a Trio in C minor (Op. 74) for flute, oboe, and pianoforte, by Herr Karl Goepfart, who was born in 1859, at Weimar, has written opera, choral, and orchestral works, and, in 1891, became conductor of the Baden-Baden Verein. The trio consists of three movements—Allegro resoluto, Andante cantabile, and Finale—all concise and well knit. The themes are melodious and are harmonised in a frank and direct manner. They are artistically distributed over the respective instruments, but although the part-writing is polyphonic, complexity is avoided, with the result that the work is easy to follow. The second novelty was a Quintet in B flat for pianoforte, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon (Op. 2), by Mr. N. R. Rice, born in 1851 at New York. This comprises four movements, a Theme and variations, Allegretto and Trio, Adagio, and Allegro. It is a less interesting work than that of Herr Goepfart. It has dull moments, but, on the whole, it is pleasing. Other little known compositions meriting record were a "Sicilienne Etude" (Op. 97) for flute solo, by P. Taffanel, and a charming "Intermezzo Scherzando" for flute, oboe, two clarinets, horn, and bassoon, by Léfèbure. Mr. Edmondstoune Duncan's prize Quintet in F (Op. 38) for pianoforte and wind instruments, which was noticed in The Musical Times for March last (page 176), was also included in the programme. It should be added that the music throughout the evening was interpreted in a most finished manner by Messrs. Fransella, Lalande, Manuel and Francisco Gomez, Fred. James, and Borsdorf, with Miss Adela Verne at the pianoforte. Madame Amy Sherwin was the vocalist.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie is to be congratulated upon being able to give the pupils of the operatic class of the Royal Academy of Music the benefit of the commodious stage of St. George's Hall for their performance, on March 24 last, of the cottage scene from the first act of Benedict's "Lily of Killarney" and Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." The chief exponents of the former were Alice M. Holder, Lillian Ginnett, Philip C. Suckling, Murray Rumsey, and Whitworth Mitton, all of whom gave proofs of careful training. The most meritorious feature of the interpretation of Mascagni's work was the embodiment of Santuzza by Ethel M. Wood. This young artist has already gained public favour as a concert singer, but she not only sang on this occasion with great expressive power, but also displayed distinct aptitude as an actress, her gestures being, in particular, admirable. The other characters were efficiently sustained by Eleanor Nicholls (Lola), Lillian Ginnett (Lucia), Murray Rumsey (Alfio), and Whitworth Mitton (Turiddu). The choruses were brightly sung and, with the stage management, reflected much credit on Mr. G. H. Betjemann, who conducted. The orchestral portion was played on two pianofortes and a harmonium.

More than usual interest was imparted to the students' concert, on March 27, at the Queen's Hall, by the inclusion in the programme of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's "Ode to the Passions" (originally produced at the recent Leeds Musical Festival), for the first time in central London. Although the contraltos and tenors were numerically weak, the choruses were effectively rendered, the students singing with care and intelligence. Exceptional promise was shown by Marjorie Hayward, a young violinist, who in appearance scarcely seems to have entered upon her teens. Dezsö Kordy played the solo part of Servais's "Morceau de Concert" for violoncello and orchestra (Op. 14) with commendable skill and taste, Hedwig Cole and Bernard C. Flanders testified to having received good pianoforte training, and Ida Wales sang meritoriously the aria "Non mi dir," from Mozart's "Don Giovanni." Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture was performed at the commencement of the concert in memory of Sir Joseph William Chitty and Lord Herschell, who were vice-presidents of the Institution. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted.

At the recent meeting of the directors the following elections took place:—Associates: Misses Leila Marion Bull, Gertrude Mary Collins, Jessie Henderson Matthay, Charlotte Thudichum, Miriam Jane Timothy, and Lily West; Messrs. Granville Bantock, William Henry Bell, Phillp Cathie, John Harold Henry, Percy Hilder Miles, Arthur Payne, Hamilton Robinson, Joseph Spawforth, and Harry James Timothy. Fellows: Mrs. Henry R. Rose (Clara Samuell), Mrs. Russell Starr, Mr. Ernest Ford, and Mr. Samuel Weekes. Mr. Edward Elgar has been elected by the committee of management an honorary member.

The Louisa Hopkins Memorial Prize has been awarded to Elsie E. Horne, a native of London. The examiners were Messrs. E. H. Thorne and Rudolf Zwintscher and Miss Dora Bright (in the chair). The Charles Mortimer Prize has been awarded to Marion White, a native of London. The examiners were Mr. Algernon Ashton, Dr. George J. Bennett, and Dr. E. H. Turpin. The competition for the Sterndale Bennett Prize took place on March 25, when the prize was awarded to Vera Margolies. The examiners were Madame M. Isabel Ley and Mr. Max Laistner.

THE GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The orchestral concert given on March 29 by the pupils at the Guildhall School of Music showed that good work is being done in this branch of musical art at the Institution. The concert was opened with a meritorious performance of Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony in C, and subsequently creditable renderings were secured of M. Joncière's "Sérénade Hongroise" and the Overture to Weber's "Oberon." A new Romance for solo violin and orchestra by Mr. Pitt proved a tasteful little piece; the solo part was expressively played by Ernest B. Moss. Herbert Simmons gave a good rendering of the air "O God, have mercy," from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." Mr. William H. Cummings conducted.

AN APPRECIATION OF BRAHMS.

Dr. Ernest Walker read a paper on Brahms at the meeting of the Musical Association, on the 11th ult., at the Royal College of Organists, which might justly be described as a critical essay on the life work of the great German composer who passed from us two years ago.

The lecturer defined the style of Brahms as "the fusion of the desire for emotional expression with the desire of structural proportion." This fusion, he said, was found in Beethoven. The romantic school put the interests of expression definitely before the interests of structure, and was dominant in Germany at the time when Brahms was forming his principles. Few words in musical technicology had been more abused than "form." It was Beethoven's and Brahms's mastery of organic unity which caused them to be ranked as the two greatest exponents of form in the fullest sense that music had known. Brahms did not develop the formal side of his music to the neglect of the expression. He balanced his emotions by the necessity of their presentation in beautiful form, and he balanced his structure by the necessity of the beauty of the material. The beauty and emotion might sometimes lie below the surface, but no great artistic work could ever be understood by the careless passer-by. The beauty was quiet, and the passion was sane; but to deny that beauty and passion were to be found in Brahms's work as a whole was either to show unacquaintance with the bulk of that work, or inability to distinguish between beauty and sensuousness, and between emotion and hysteria. It suited the general tenor of Brahms's melodies to employ principally diatonic harmonies, and he deliberately avoided the wider field of the chromatic genus, keeping the latter in reserve for special occasions. But there was never the least monotony or weakness about his harmonisation. It was extraordinarily simple and extraordinarily convincing. His arrangement of "Deutsche Volkslieder" made almost all other harmonisations of folk-tunes sound forced and unnatural. His counterpoint was living, and not like most modern counterpoint, utterly dead. In his orchestration it must be admitted that Brahms possessed less absolute mastery than Wagner and Dvorák. He had much less variety and much less sensuous beauty; but his scoring was never in any way bad, as Schumann's often was, and it might with justness be said that the style adopted was the only one which would fit in with the style of Brahms's ideas; and the cool grey tints of Brahms were a great relief after the continued blaze and intensity of the bulk of modern scoring.

Orchestration was the lowest department of musical technique, it was the most sensuous and the least intellectual. It was simply a frame to the picture, and there was something seriously wrong if the frame prevented the picture from being clearly seen. Brahms was an intellectual artist in every sense of the term. By many intellectuality in music was supposed to be equivalent to dulness, but there was really no sort of connection between the two. Intellectuality in music meant neither mechanical pedantry nor soulless cleverness; but it did mean proportion, due restraint, and breadth of style. Above all, Brahms recognised what music could do and what it could not. He was the prophet of "absolute music." In programme music there was but one step from the sublime to the ridiculous, and it was a step that was very easy to take. Brahms avoided realism, it was always the mood, not the thing that was painted. Neither was Brahms national in the sense commonly understood to-day. He always endeavoured to talk a world language, not a dialect. No nineteenth century composer, except Beethoven and Schubert, possessed even approximately comparable gifts of melody. In directness of expression it must be admitted that Brahms was inferior to Beethoven and Schubert.

In conclusion, the lecturer said "Brahms, in short, seems to me the ideal for music in the present time. He has left us examples of what seems to me absolutely flawless art in every department of music from the largest to the smallest, with the solitary exception of opera, which, after all, is only music in a partial sense. He is the last and, from that mere historical fact, the closest to us of those great composers who knew that music could stand alone, and that it owes no debt to the stage or to anything outside itself. He may be—if music has to advance, he must be—in some manner surpassed some day; but that day is not yet. I do not mean that we ought to imitate his individual manner of expression, for conscious imitation of a great man only means copying his weaknesses; but we ought to imitate his ideal. The ideal at which he aimed, and which he reached, is the ideal of an art which seeks, in the fullest sense of the word, nobility of idea and of style before all else—an art which, in its greatest beauty and its greatest emotional force, is still strong—an art which never compromises one jot of its principles, and never appeals to the crude senses—an art which recognises the dignity and the value of reserve, and which shows that the greatest work is done, not under the expansive banner of anarchy, but under the dominion of intellectual self-imposed laws. 'It is only law that can give us freedom.' That is the motto of Brahms and of all great work, and it is a motto which, in the dawn of the twentieth century, we do not always remember."

MUSIC COMPETITIONS.

THE "WAKEFIELD" COMPETITIONS AND FESTIVAL AT KENDAL.

On the 12th ult. was begun the fourteenth of the Music Competitions and Festivals instituted in Westmorland by Miss Wakefield. As for some years past, it extended over three days, and the number of competitors and the standard reached by them fully sustained the repute of these Festivals, and showed what they have accomplished for the cultivation of good music in the district. It is, indeed, in the character of the music set as tests that the value of these competitions largely consists. Even the very useful and encouraging criticisms of the judges, Messrs. F. Cunningham Woods and Lionel Benson, would be of comparatively little use were they applied to performances of worthless music, such as, unhappily, finds its way into many less artistically organised competitions. The twelve baritones, for instance, who essayed Lully's "Sombre Woods," or the eleven choirs that had prepared with such pains Marenzio's madrigal "Lady, see on every side," could not but be the better for becoming intimate with such music, and less likely to be contented with the sentimental pot-boilers that are, alas, so popular.

The opening day was confined to the junior competitions. In the choral classes the girls considerably outstripped the boys, the latter reaching a much lower standard. Possibly this may be accounted for by the attitude which boys assume towards music, as not worthy of their superior intellects, but, whatever the reason, the discrepancy was very noticeable. The sight reading was good, whether of individuals or choirs, and in this all-important feature of the competitions it is satisfactory to know there was a keener contest and a higher standard than ever. The day's proceedings ended with a concert, at which a bright and tuneful children's cantata, by Mr. Cunningham Woods, "Old May Day," was very successfully produced for the first time. A violoncello solo by Mr. Harold Smith, a Kendal youth who has recently won a Royal College Scholarship, was another interesting feature of the programme.

On the second day came the solo and instrumental competitions. In the vocal classes the baritones were pre-eminent, the tenors being, on the whole, overweighted by Handel's "Love in her eyes sits playing," though the winner sang it well enough. Some of them, too, were addicted to those arbitrary licenses which seem to be the peculiar attribute of the tenor. The instrumental classes were particularly interesting. The solo violinists were fairly numerous, and there was a noteworthy improvement in the manner in which the specified scales were played, especially in the juvenile section. The winner in the latter class, a Miss Germain, showed really exceptional promise for so young a player. The pianoforte trios were not either numerous or remarkable, nor were the quartet parties much more successful, though they had an extremely difficult task to plead. Full atonement was, however, made in the highly interesting class for village orchestras, or "orchestral happy families," as their very miscellaneous materials inclines one to style them. This class, begun last year, showed a most encouraging improvement, and it spoke volumes for the energy and enthusiasm of the players, most of whom hailed from out of the way country places, that they could achieve such a praiseworthy ensemble in the Minuet and Trio from the "Italian" Symphony. The concert which ended the day brought forward a novelty in Miss Liza Lehmann's setting of Scott's "Young Lochinvar." It is a capital piece of work, combining lyrical charm with picturesqueness and even dramatic force. The ballad character is well preserved, but the monotony of unbroken lyrical form is avoided by the development of any romantic or dramatic situation suggested by the text. It was performed with great spirit under Miss Wakefield's direction, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford sang the solo part with admirable force and clearness of enunciation. Piquancy was given to the situation by the presence in the hall of the present mistress of the Netherby Hall made famous by the ballad, Lady Cynthia Graham, who, during the evening, distributed the prizes. An excellent all-round performance of Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens" music was another important feature of a somewhat lengthy programme.

The third day was given up to choral competitions, which remain the most important feature of the event. In order to avoid unequal contests, it has been found advisable to divide the village choir competitions into three sections. The first had a special interest, in that the test piece was, like the performers, of home growth. It was a dainty little ballet, "Come away, sweet love, and play," by Mr. G. Rathbone, who shared with Mr. Bird the office of accompanist at the Festival, and is a sparkling imitation of the quaint "Fa las" of Elizabethan times. It certainly produced some very crisp and pleasant singing. For the second set of village choirs Sullivan's "O gladsome light" was the test piece, and resulted in some exaggerated sentiment that was very properly criticised by the judges. Similarly, arbitrary effects of "expression"—or what passes for expression—were the chief failing in the third set of village choirs, which sang Handel's "Haste thee, Nymph." Some, however, reproduced very happily the rollicking gaiety of the music. The sight-reading test for choirs was peculiarly satisfactory. Thirteen choirs attempted the ordeal, and the three which were most successful went through a still more severe test. The level of attainment was high, and it was extraordinary how some choirs managed to pay attention to expression as well as to the bare notes. The most important class of all, the madrigal competition, produced, as usual, some remarkably finished performances. The closeness of the competition is attested by the fact that while the winners—the Brough choir—obtained 46 marks out of a possible 50, the last of the eleven choirs secured as many as 34. The important distinction of the Novello prize, awarded for the highest aggregate of marks obtained by any choir, was won by Sedbergh, which is always prominent at these competitions. At the last concert Miss Lehmann's "Persian Garden" cycle was most sympathetically sung by Miss Evangeline Florence, Miss Wakefield, Mr. Hast, and Mr. Rumford, the pianoforte part being played by the composer. It speaks well for the artistic comprehension of the Westmorland people that it was received with downright enthusiasm. Mr. Elgar's broad and richly coloured cantata "The Banner of St. George" was sung with immense spirit and vigour by the united choirs, numbering some 350 voices in all.

During the day Miss Wakefield took her friends somewhat by surprise in announcing her resignation of the conductorship. Her chief ground was the difficulty of finding a suitable locale for the Festival now that St. George's Hall is no longer available. Considering the educational value of these competitions, which are conducted on such artistic and practical lines that their influence is entirely for good, it is very much to be hoped that means will be found for complying with the by no means exorbitant requirements which Miss Wakefield lays down.

ISLE OF MAN.

The annual music competitions, organised by the Isle of Man Fine Arts and Industrial Guild, were held at Douglas on March 22 and 23. There were numerous sections for soloists (junior and senior), duets, school choirs, village choirs, individual and collective sight reading, violin playing, trios for stringed instruments, female voice choirs, male voice choirs, and church and chapel choirs. There was a special section for the encouragement of the collection of Manx airs, and another for their solo performance; and concerts were arranged for the evenings of the two days on which the competitions were held. A general conclusion of Dr. McNaught, who adjudicated, was that there is ample natural capacity for music in the island and that there are many teachers perfectly capable of training this capacity. The voices were of good quality and fairly full, and there was often much daintiness and taste displayed in the execution. The competitions were held in a vast and handsome hall called the Palace. The evening concerts were well attended. On the second evening the winning soloists and choirs sang, and the combined choirs performed a specially prepared set of pieces, including Faning's "Miller's Wooing," Schubert's "Shepherds' Chorus," and Pinsuti's "Eldorado." A pleasing feature was the admirable playing of a "scratch" orchestra got together by Mr. Harry Wood, a highly esteemed and competent local professor. Mention should be made of the work of Miss M. L. Wood, who conducted many choirs. This indefatigable lady must have exercised extraordinary influence over the musical life of the island. Miss McKnight is also another praiseworthy worker. The arrangements made for the smooth working of the competitions were ably thought out by the honorary secretary, Mrs. Laughton.

The chief results were as follows:

Female Voice Choirs (four entries)—1st, Andreas (Miss Emily Gill); 2nd, Pupil Teachers, Douglas (Miss M. L. Wood).

Village Choirs (six entries)—1st, St. Catherine's, Port Erin (Mr. A. Cregeen); 2nd, Foxdale (Mr. W. E. Callister).

Male Voice Choirs (four entries)—1st, Castletown (Miss McKnight); 2nd, Ramsey (Mr. Edward Fennah).

THE MADRESFIELD MUSICAL COMPETITIONS (MALVERN).

The establishment of a series of musical competitions at Malvern must be credited mainly to the ability and enthusiasm of Lady Mary Lygon. These annual competitions were held for the fourth time on the 8th and 10th ult., and were more successful in many ways than they had previously been. In the children's sections there were between three and four hundred children concerned, and about three hundred adults also took part in the Festival. There were sections for individual and collective sight singing, sight playing, string quartets, school choir madrigal quartets, village choirs, town choral societies, and church choirs. Altogether, the two days' closely fitted work showed that in the Malvern district there is at least a fair amount of musical activity. The choral singing was often very good. The material needs more cultivation, and, as this is just what these competitions are organised to promote, it may be confidently expected that teachers and choralists will soon learn how to acquire the skill that will enable the results to compare favourably with those attained in other districts. The chief defects at the present competitions were the want of good blend and especially the lack of clear enunciation. Against this must be placed the ample enthusiasm of many of the choirs. Malvern Wells, Callow End, and Wyche all secured first places in one or other of the junior choir sections. The chief choral prize was gained by the Malvern Link Society, which gave a refined performance of Dvorák's "Sclavonic Cradle Song." Dr. McNaught adjudicated. The proceedings were brought to a close by a concert at which the combined adult choirs sang, assisted by a small orchestral band. The programme included Tschaïkowsky's cantata for female voices "Nature and love," and Elgar's chorus "It comes from the misty ages," from "The Banner of St. George." The choral singing was excellent in tone and attack. Lady Mary Lygon conducted with decision and ability; her brother, Earl Beauchamp, distributed the prizes.

TONYPANDY EISTEDDFOD.

A series of musical competitions was held at Tonypandy, a small town in the Rhondda Valley, South Wales, on Easter Monday and the following day. The event was a success, notwithstanding the drenching rain that fell on the second morning. Several thousands of persons paid to enter the spacious but unfortunately not rain-proof marquee that had been erected on a rough field situated on a steep incline. The Eisteddfod illustrated all the good and bad points that are associated with this ancient institution. There was the immense, patient crowd, willing to be amused, easily excited, and critical of every good and bad point. The time table, as usual, was a trustworthy statement of the times at which a competition would not take place. The choirs, when they did arrive on the platform, took the usual time to arrange, re-arrange, and disarrange, and had the key chord and the first few bars of the test piece played over the customary maddening number of times. But against all this must be placed the abundant enthusiasm, the sentiment, now fiery, now touchingly tender, and the subordination of the singers to conductors who exercise the fascination of snake charmers. It might have been supposed that the relentless rain would have prevented the competitors from appearing. But it was not so, for on the second day there was a never ending procession of brass bands, female voice choirs, men's voice choirs, mixed voice choirs, vocal quartets, and solo singers of all classes of voice. They came in hundreds, muddy and wet, but tremendously in earnest. In the vocal sections the chief choral prize, a gold crown for the conductor and £60, was won by the Maesteg Music Lovers, conducted by Mr. Gwilym Taf. In the chief male voice competition the first prize was fully deserved by the Tor and Pentre Glee Society, conducted by Mr. D. S. Evans, although this was the only entry. The choir sang "Night and Day" (Dord), a French piece, with marvellous beauty of tone and general excellence. In the smaller male voice choir section the Blaenclydach Music Lovers, under Mr. Benjamin Davies, gained the first prize, which included a pair of boots for the conductor; the second prize, which included a pair of trousers for the conductor, being won by the Wardy Male Voice Party, conducted by Mr. John Michael. The female voice choir prize was taken, after an excellent contest, by the Mountain Ash Choir, conducted by Mr. T. Glyndwr Richards. In the brass band section the chief prize fell to the Ferndale Prize Band. This was a keen contest, as several bands of reputation entered. Mr. Ord Hume adjudicated the brass band competitions, Mr. Ivor Foster and Dr. McNaught the solo singing, and the latter took the choral sections alone.

BRIDLINGTON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

A century ago, in less democratic times than ours, the cultivation of music was largely in the hands of German princelings, whose private orchestras gave employment to native players and encouraged native composers. Something of this kind is, on a small scale, being done by a Yorkshire squire, Mr. A. W. M. Bosville, who has instituted an annual Festival at Bridlington, of which he is conductor, chorus-master, programme-analyst, host, and—not least—the obliging banker. The sixth of these unique Festivals took place on the 20th ult., when the two concerts presented, as usual, features of exceptional interest. The first place was taken by Dr. Stanford's Leeds "Te Deum," a work of whose power and impressiveness one becomes more convinced with each successive hearing. It formed what is slangily but expressively known as "a large order," which the forces at Mr. Bosville's disposal had some difficulty in executing. Even if they cannot be said to have exercised an ideal "punctuality and dispatch," their exceedingly plucky efforts deserve warm commendation. East Riding voices have not the weight associated with those of the West Riding, nor do the singers have that precision which one finds in a district where choral music is greatly practised. They were heard to greater advantage in the evening when they sang Mr. Elgar's romantic and powerful cantata "The Black Knight"—which, singular to relate, was heard for the first time in Yorkshire—and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's fresh and original "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," in which they were particularly successful. The orchestra, almost exclusively Yorkshire in its composition, employed the normal diapason, which may be taken as a satisfactory proof that this reform is making its way in the provinces. Though somewhat wanting in delicacy, and certainly too heavy for the chorus, its playing was characterised by much vigour and "go," and by an excellent tone in forte passages. Its most prominent task was in Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, the opening movement of which was played with a freshness and briskness of effect quite springlike. By a curious coincidence the thunderstorm was anticipated by an actual one that broke during the "Te Deum," a rattling peal of thunder occurring, with impressive effect, during the silent bar just preceding the final cadence. Still Beethoven came well out of the comparison, though the subtleties of his storm were hardly appreciated by the orchestra.

A novelty was furnished in the shape of a Pianoforte Concerto in A, written for the occasion by Mr. A. C. Edwards, organist of Bridlington Priory Church, who played the solo part. Though not possessing any very striking claims to originality, Bridlington has every reason to feel satisfied at the possession of a musician of such nice feeling and technical efficiency as Mr. Edwards. The weak points in his concerto are an apparent want of experience in treating the orchestra, which is handled somewhat tentatively, and lack of sufficiently interesting development, and of brilliancy and effectiveness in the solo part to justify the title of "concerto." On the other hand, there is real musicianly feeling, and the subjects are thoroughly tuneful, unforced, and artistic. Traces of haste were apparent in both music and performance, so that it would be unwise to accept this as a final test of the composer's powers, of which he should be encouraged to give us a further taste.

The rest of the programme, though miscellaneous, could not be called trifling. The nearest approach to flippancy was Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Merchant of Venice" Masque; but it is well to unbend occasionally, especially if one can do so with such refreshing results. Miss Agnes Nicholls sang the great scena from "Der Freischütz" very ably, and Mr. Francis Harford, so far as his vocal powers allowed him, infused genuine feeling into "Wotan's Abschied." Mrs. Bosville, the clever wife of the conductor, sang with undoubted charm the once popular "Robert, toi que j'aime," which, if now somewhat faded, has a chance of enduring as one of Meyerbeer's comparatively rare instances of artistic sincerity. The contralto, Mrs. Burrell, had no other chance of distinction than was afforded in the "Te Deum," where she proved thoroughly worthy of association with a particularly efficient and artistic quartet. Mr. Gregory Hast had, on the other hand, two opportunities in the evening concert. He sang the delightful love song in "Hiawatha" with refinement, but hardly with all the warmth of expression it calls for, and was more successful in the very pretty serenade in Sullivan's Masque, which he sang admirably. The "Hebrides" Overture and the "Walkürenritt" completed this interesting programme, the whole of which was conducted very ably by Mr. Bosville, who displayed a greater reticence of gesture and a more genuine command of his resources than on previous occasions.

REVIEWS.

A Modern School for the Violin. By August Wilhelmj and James Brown. Section I., Book II.—Technical Practice. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

The present book (which is just published) contains exercises introducing the third and second positions, the half position, extensions, harmonics, chromatic scales, major scales, minor scales, harmonic and melodic, chords, pizzicato, shakes, various bowings, and the stopping of thirds, fourths, fifths, sixths, and octaves.

All new bowings are given in their simplest and plainest forms with explicit directions, and with little or no fingering, in order that the undistracted attention of the pupil may be concentrated, for the time being, upon the bowings alone. Copious illustrations of these bowings, as of all other technical points, will be found in "Studies," Book II., which is intended to be used concurrently with the present book, and will shortly be issued.

We are told by the authors that exact intonation, without which no student can become a good player, may be cleared of some of its worst difficulties by a thorough knowledge of the intervals. The subject is treated most exhaustively on both its theoretical and practical sides.

The authors strongly insist on the importance of ear training, the training of the ear at this stage being the most important part of the young violinist's work; and it is a distinguishing mark of excellence in both teacher and pupil that neither remains content with approximate correctness in this important matter, but that each aims constantly and deliberately at perfect intonation.

And so, step by step, the pupil is led onward. Most valuable advice is given on every point by a perfect master of the art of violin playing, and will be followed with the greatest confidence by the student.

Richard Wagner's Prose Works. Vol. VII. In Paris and Dresden. Translated by William Ashton Ellis.
[Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner and Co.]

One more volume, to be issued during the present year, and Mr. Ashton Ellis will have completed his congenial task of translating into English Richard Wagner's Prose works. The present volume is of a specially varied and interesting nature. It covers the period of Wagner's pecuniary embarrassment in Paris in the early forties, when he did journalistic work, made "arrangements" for music publishers in order to keep body and soul together. In this connection Mr. Ellis says: "The number and extent of those 'arrangements for every instrument under heaven' it is impossible to compute, but on the last page of the Gazette for July 25 and September 26, 1841, we find Schlesinger advertising the overture and three 'suites' of the Favorite, the overture and two suites of Guitarrero, arranged by Wagner for a quartet of two violins, viola and 'cello, or flute, violin, viola and 'cello, with a separate arrangement of each of these for two violins. Whether he really had previously had to write 'quadrilles and galops,' I am unable to ascertain." The various articles herein translated by Mr. Ellis that Wagner contributed to the Gazette Musicale, 1840-41, are very entertaining. It may be of interest to mention, though Wagner does not seem to refer to the circumstance, that he proceeded to Paris in 1839 viâ London. During this his first visit to, and temporary sojourn in the Metropolis, Wagner, in company with "his little wife and his big dog," stayed for one night at the "Hoop and Horsehoe" inn, close to Tower Hill, whence, for the remaining seven days of his London visit, he migrated to Soho. At Boulogne, where he made a friend of Meyerbeer, we believe that he stayed at a little inn known as "Le petit caporal," above the town on the road to Paris. It would be interesting to know if this hostelry is still in existence, as is the "Hoop and Horseshoe" in London. But to return to Mr. Ellis's volume. It includes an interesting account of the re-interment of Weber's remains in Dresden and Wagner's speech at the graveside of his distinguished countryman and brother artist. In the carrying out of this re-interment Wagner played a very important part—in fact, had it not been for his determined energy in the matter, the body of the composer of "Der Freischütz" would in all probability still be resting in the vaults of St. Mary's, Moorfields, where it was laid in 1826. In the original version of his "Bericht" of the re-interment Wagner made a curious mistake in saying that "the modest coffin which sheltered Weber's ashes was [in 1839] stowed in an out-of-the-way corner of St. Paul's church in London," from which it might be inferred that St. Paul's Cathedral was meant. A "report on the performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony at Dresden in 1846, together with a programme," is another interesting feature of the book. A translation of Wagner's "analytical programme" (designated by Mr. J. W. Davison "an interesting rhapsody") was inserted in the programme of the Philharmonic Society of March 26, 1855, when Wagner conducted the "Choral" Symphony. Other essays in this volume are "The Nibelungen-Myth" (the germ of "Götterdämmerung") and "Plan of organisation of a German National Theatre for the Kingdom of Saxony." As heretofore, Mr. Ashton Ellis has discharged the duties of translator and editor with exemplary thoroughness. His "summary" leaves nothing to be desired and the index is ideally complete.

The Village Organist. Book 17. Wedding Music. Book 18. Funeral Marches.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 274-276.

Grand Choral Prelude, "Vater unser im Himmelreich" (Bach's Organ Works, No. 15). Edited by J. F. Bridge and James Higgs.

Organ Arrangements. Edited by George C. Martin. No. 52. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

A new departure has been made in the last two instalments of "The Village Organist," which will doubtless find acceptance by reason of its practical utility. Book 17 furnishes material for the music at nuptial ceremonies, and consists of Guilmant's Wedding March ("Souvenir de la Marche de Procession") in G; the Bridal Chorus from "Lohengrin"; "Be thou faithful unto death," from St. Paul"; Hofmann's "Wedding Procession" (Op. 19, No. 6); and the inevitable Wedding March by Mendelssohn, without which no wedding seems to be complete—at least, so the brides say, and they ought to know. Book 18 is in strong contrast to its predecessor—the transition being from "gay to grave," from "lively to severe." Here we have four "Funeral Marches" and one "Dead March." They are respectively by Beethoven (the slow movement from the Pianoforte Sonata in A flat, Op. 26, transposed from A flat minor into A minor); Chopin (from the Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 35, and transposed into C minor); Mackenzie (from "The Story of Sayid"); Mendelssohn (the Lied ohne Worte in E minor, No. 27); and the Dead March, which, of course, is that from Handel's "Saul." The advantage of having these ten pieces (five in each book) in such a handy form is obvious. The printing and spacing out of the music are everything that can be desired and the price is a marvel of cheapness.

The most recent numbers (Nos. 274-276) of the "Original Compositions for the Organ" consist of Schumann's Six Studies, in the form of Canons, "originally composed for the pedal pianoforte." The introduction of a pedal pianoforte into the Conservatorium at Leipzig, during the period when Schumann was a professor of composition there, furnished the raison d'être of these compositions and of a somewhat similar set, the "Four Sketches" (Op. 58), forming Nos. 268 and 269 of the present series. They were all composed for the practice-hours of the organ students. Unfortunately they have hitherto been printed in such an intricate form as to repel the generality of organists. No such charge can be laid against the present edition, which has passed under the critical and experienced eye of Mr. John E. West.

The Royal College of Organists has selected Bach's "Vater unser im Himmelreich" as one of the test pieces for the approaching examination for Fellowship; therefore the issue of this fine work in the series of the great Cantor's works edited by Sir J. F. Bridge and Mr. James Higgs is very opportune. In addition to the usual supervision at the hands of the editors of the series, the interesting preface contains an outline of the canon, which will prove of great assistance to those who study this noble choral, which, we need hardly remind our readers, is that used by Mendelssohn as the sum and substance of his sixth Organ Sonata.

Mr. Edward Elgar's Meditation from "The Light of Life" ("Lux Christi"), forming No. 52 of the Organ Arrangements edited by Sir George Martin, has been arranged for the organ by the skilful hands of Mr. John E. West. In its new form this thoughtful and deeply impressive work will prove a welcome addition to the répertoire of players upon the king of instruments.

The Church Missionary Hymn Book.
[Church Missionary Society.]

The centenary of the Church Missionary Society, which has been celebrated with great success in the Metropolis during the past month, has provided a fitting opportunity for the issue of this book. The preface states that "it does not profess to be a Book for General Public Worship"; therefore the standard of criticism must be modified to suit the exigencies of the case, if indeed it should not be reduced to a minimum. The selection of the tunes has been made by a sub-committee, who accept all responsibility for the choice, and Dr. E. J. Bellerby has edited the musical portion of the book with due regard to its special circumstances and constituency. The tunes, while including some that have become a glorious heritage of the Christian Church for all time, are for the most part those held in favour by missionary and evangelistic choirs, and used at special services. We regret to find that "Hymns Ancient and Modern" version of "Miles's Lane" (No. 39) has been followed in this book, whereby Shrubsole's original melody is made to rise to the third of the scale, instead of falling to the keynote, at the words "Let angels prostrate fall." This error should be corrected at once. The Preface contains some useful hints to missionary choirs, by whom the book will doubtless be highly appreciated and valued.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 604 and 605, 608-610, and 614. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Recent numbers in this valuable series comprise the following: No. 604, "Give thanks, O Israel," composed by the late Sir F. A. G. Ouseley. It is hardly needful to say that this is written in the most orthodox Church style. It opens with a chorus in four parts of vigorous character, solidly harmonised and admirably balanced with regard to form. This is succeeded by solo passages for the tenors and basses in unison, which in turn give place to a flowingly written quartet. The Finale consists of a cleverly developed fugue, a tempo giusto, in which effective use is made of the resources of contrapuntal art. No. 605 is a festival anthem, entitled "God is my salvation," by Charles F. Bowes. It is jubilant in character, but will be found easy to sing, the music being straightforward in expression and the harmonic design being diatonic. It would be well suited where vocal abilities are limited. No. 608, "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord," by Josiah

Booth, makes more demands on its exponents, but presents no exceptional difficulties—will, indeed, give no trouble to a well-trained choir. It is suitable for all occasions when an anthem bright and confident in spirit is appropriate. The text of No. 609 is that of No. 196 of "Hymns Ancient and Modern," "Guide me, O Thou Great Redeemer." The music, by Hugh Blair, is most sympathetic, and possesses great melodic beauty. There are short passages for solo voices, and in some places the soprano soloist sings with the other four, or is answered by the other voices in solid four-part harmony. The anthem is a very favourable example of the musical talent of the clever young musician. The chorus "Weary pilgrims, know no fear," from Franco Leoni's sacred cantata "The Gate of Life," forms No. 610. The music is devotional and graceful in nature, and the text, written by Shapcott Wensley, renders the anthem specially suitable for All Saints' Day. Choirs which can sing in five parts unaccompanied will find a fine example of old English music in No. 614, "Justorum Animæ" (The Souls of the Righteous), an offertory for the Feast of All Saints, composed by William Byrd. This edition has been admirably edited by Mr. Barclay Squire, and is furnished with English as well as Latin words.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Trios, Quartets, &c. For Female Voices. Nos. 321-325.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Few pursuits are more pleasurable than part-singing, and a few copies of part-songs will cause many an hour to pass swiftly and pleasantly. The series under notice comprises a most comprehensive selection of trios and quartets, and the recent additions fully maintain the excellence of the collection. No. 321 is a setting for soprano, mezzo-soprano, and contralto voices of Herrick's dainty little poem "Fair Daffodils," and the lines have been wedded by Mr. A. H. Behrend to simple but tuneful strains, which will present no difficulties to music-lovers of ordinary abilities. No. 322 comprises two vivacious little quartets, with German as well as English words. They are called "Garden Songs," and the quaint text of Rückert has been translated by the Rev. J. Troutbeck. The music, by Leone Sinigaglia, demands vocalists of some skill; but by such these quartets might be made very effective. The three following numbers are by the same composer. No. 323 is "A Winter Song," translated from the German of Höltz. The music is designed for soprano solo and chorus in two parts for first and second sopranos, but the part-writing is so interesting and melodious that the song would be effectively rendered by three solo voices. No. 324, entitled "The Greenfinch," opens with a chorus in four parts for first and second sopranos and first and second contraltos. This is succeeded by a solo of eighteen bars for a soprano voice, for which there are subsequently some other solo passages. The music makes some demands on executive skill, but would repay the practice necessary to do it justice. The chorus parts of No. 325, "A Loving Burial," are for first and second sopranos and contralto, which support a soprano solo part. The expression of the music is regretful but tender, and melancholy does not banish hope. It should be added that all the numbers by this composer are furnished with effective accompaniments for the pianoforte.

Novello's School Music. Little Bo-Peep. A fairy Operetta for Children. Words by Constance M. Lowe. Music by C. Egerton Lowe.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Little Bo-Peep was undoubtedly one of those reprehensible people who are always losing their belongings and expecting other people to find them, and young folks who show an inclination to fall into Bo-Peep's devious ways should at once be brought to witness the above operetta. Into the midst of a bevy of fairies, who are singing gaily, Bo-Peep comes weeping to seek their aid to find her lost sheep. The fairies having condoled with her, lull her to sleep and depart to search for the wandering animals. They, however, leave Mischief behind, who forthwith executes a "sprite's gavotte," and at its conclusion tells Bo-Peep that her sheep are found, but that they have left their tails behind them. Bo-Peep manifestly possesses a temperament which takes life very seriously, and some explanation is necessitated to convince her that the tails of her sheep need not necessarily have been cut off because they are behind them. When this has been achieved, however, there follows a merry dance and chorus upon which the curtain falls. The whole book is written in rhyme, which makes the only speaking part, that of Mischief, easy to learn by heart. The songs and choruses are very attractive and easy to remember, and happy use is made in the latter, which are all in unison, of an old English dance tune and the canon "Three blind mice," sung in this instance to the words "Poor lost sheep, see how they run," &c. Only five principal exponents are required, and two of these have little to do. The dresses, those of a shepherdess and fairies, might be made very picturesque.

Lady! in this Night of June. Song. With violoncello obbligato. Written by Alfred Austin. Composed by Frances Allitsen.

Where art thou? Vocal Duet. Written by Calamo Currente. Composed by Donald McHardy.

Only Memories. Song. Written by Wilfred Mills. Composed by Frank Moir.

[Metzler and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Austin's dainty little poem, "Lady! in this night of June," has received a sympathetic setting by Miss Allitsen, and the changing moods of the lover speculating on the occupation of his fair one as he gazes at the moon have been cleverly followed. The voice part is laid out for a tenor.

In "Where art thou?" will be found a flowingly-written and graceful duet suitable for mezzo-soprano and baritone voices. The vocal parts answer each other in an interesting and effective manner.

"Only Memories" is an unpretentious song, in which a forsaken lover expresses his determination to live on memories of the period before the object of his affections had met "the other man."

The King shall rejoice. Anthem. By Frederic Oddin Taylor.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in F. By Wilfred George Marshall.

Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G. By Thomas Hutchinson.

Athanasian Creed. Set to music by G. Prior.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

There is much merit in Mr. Taylor's setting of the Psalmist's verses which have long been associated with royalty. The choral portion is in four parts throughout, and will present few difficulties to the singers. The part-writing is fluent, the harmonic scheme direct and well knit, and the most important lines of the text are allied to music of a solid and emphatic nature. The organ accompaniment, while admirably supporting the voices, also possesses considerable independence. The anthem would be most suitable on Accession Day or any special event in commemoration of the Queen's reign, but it would not be out of place on other occasions.

Mr. Marshall's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis is chiefly for voices in unison, but monotony is avoided by giving certain lines to tenors, and tenors and basses, and occasional passages in four-part harmony. The voice parts are melodious, and their effectiveness increased, notably in the Nunc dimittis, by the freedom of the organ part.

The music allied to the evening Canticles by Dr. Hutchinson is of a similar kind in point of simplicity, but contains more four-part writing for the voices and is more chromatic in character. The organ accompaniment does little more than double the voice parts.

The arrangement of the Athanasian Creed is in chant form for voices in unison, with a harmonised organ accompaniment. After the first two verses, which are sung full, the majority of those which follow are delivered alternately by the men and boys of the choir. A double chant is given for the Gloria.

The Conservatoire Collection of Choice Pianoforte Music. Edited by Henry Germer. [Breitkopf and Härtel.]

This collection of pianoforte music is stated to be "For instruction and recreation, selected, carefully revised and edited with correct fingering and expression marks," and examination of the pieces justifies this assertion. Amongst the twenty-two composers who contribute to the seventy-eight numbers some English names might certainly have been included with advantage to the artistic value of the series; but with this exception no fault can reasonably be found with the choice of the contributors. The pieces vary considerably in length and difficulty, some telling their tale in twenty-four bars and others extending to twenty-one pages, while the executive demands range from a "Doll's Dance," by Albert Foester, to Liszt's brilliant transcription of the "Spinning Song" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and the reception music from the same composer's "Tannhäuser." The majority of the pieces, however, are of a light and easy nature, and many of them are very charming.

Six Rustic Songs. Words by Harold Boulton. Music by A. C. Mackenzie. (Op. 60.) [G. Ricordi and Co.]

The text of these songs is unpretentious and the neatly written lines are descriptive of the characteristics of the chief months in the year as seen in the country, with briefly applied moral reflections; but they have a poetic ring, and Sir Alexander Mackenzie's music is delightfully sympathetic, grateful to sing, and easy but interesting to play. The third song, entitled "Solitude," is a little gem; and those named "In leafy June" and "The time for wooing" brim over with light-hearted gaiety. Vocalists should make early acquaintance with these songs, and we shall hope to hear some of them in our concert-rooms.

MUSIC IN BELFAST.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Musical Times for April gave a notice of a performance of "King Saul" in Dublin on March 15, where the composer himself was the conductor. The accomplished and genial Sir Hubert Parry came from Dublin to Belfast, where he conducted a performance by the Philharmonic Society of the same work on March 17. Miss Agnes Nicholl and Miss Muriel Foster came with the conductor, but the solo singers were not quite the same in Belfast as in Dublin, for Miss McKisack took the second contralto part (the Evil Spirit) and sang it quite admirably. Mr. Tom Thomas was the tenor and Mr. Charles Phillips the bass. The chorus of the Society, which can sing Berlioz's "Faust" as well as any chorus, found "King Saul" exceptionally difficult, but under the careful training of Dr. Koeller they knew their work thoroughly. The orchestra was of course reinforced largely from Dublin and England, although Miss Davis, our harpist—and a good one—is "local."

As "King Saul" was criticised and appreciated by competent hands when it first appeared, it may seem quite presumptuous to speak here of its merits or defects. The work was greatly admired by a full house, and the "compuctor" (pardon this "portmanteau word," à la Alice in Wonderland, for a person combining the offices of composer and conductor) received the most gratifying applause when he laid down his baton. The performance as a whole was a good one. It might be invidious to discriminate among the solo singers, but Miss Muriel Foster's singing of the Ballad of the Death of Saul (Act iv., scene 2) was so exceptionally beautiful and tenderly sympathetic that we must specially mention it. This concert brought a very successful season of the Philharmonic Society to a close.

On the 8th ult. Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed as the last of "The People's Concerts" for the season. The prices of admission were only one shilling and sixpence, and the Ulster Hall was overflowingly full. The solo parts were sung by Belfast amateurs, and all the performers in chorus and orchestra were local. It is therefore a thing to be proud of that the performance of what used to be thought a work of the first magnitude and difficulty should have been really an excellent one, making allowance of course for the difference between professional and amateur singing. Dr. Koeller, the originator of these concerts, conducted with his well known ability and steadiness.

The greatest musical refreshment of the year to us "habitantes in Sicco" was a visit of the Hallé Orchestra on the 10th ult. Mr. F. H. Cowen conducted his seventy-seven splendid players, and it was indeed a treat to hear some of the finest compositions interpreted as only such a band can interpret them. The programme comprised the Overtures to "Rienzi," "The Midsummer Night's Dream," and "William Tell," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, Berlioz's "Hungarian" March, Tschaïkowsky's Air and Variations from Suite in G, and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 4, arranged for orchestra. The variety was almost overwhelming, but although there were no solos, either vocal or instrumental, the audience sat entranced to the end.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company brought a week's visit to a close on March 25. Seven performances were given at the Theatre Royal, of which three were devoted to Wagner. The other operas were "Carmen," "Faust," and the "Bohemian Girl." The artists included Miss Lucile Hill, Miss Kirkby Lunn, Mr. Philip Brozel, Mr. Reginald Brophy, Mr. Arthur Winckworth, and others. Mr. Hamish MacCunn was chief conductor.

On March 28 the last of Mr. Halford's concerts took place in the Town Hall The function was a complimentary concert given to Mr. Halford by the members of his orchestra. The programme consisted of the Overture to "Tannhäuser," the Prelude and closing scene of Act i., from "Parsifal," and Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony. A special choir was organised for the occasion, and the vocal principals were Miss Rosina Hammacott, Miss Lilian Hovey, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. A. F. Ferguson. The whole went off exceedingly well, and Mr. Halford was the recipient of a well-deserved ovation. In presenting during a single season Beethoven's nine symphonies in consecutive order Mr. Halford has done good service in the cause of musical art.

On Good Friday, March 31, the Midland Musical Society gave its annual performance of Gounod's "Redemption" in the Town Hall. The place was packed to the doors. The vocal principals were Madame Lizzie Matthews, Miss Nellie Pritchard, Mr. Hamlyn Crimp, and Mr. William Bennett. Mr. C. W. Perkins was at the organ and Mr. H. M. Stevenson conducted.

On March 25 the Choral and Orchestral Association gave a very fair performance of Gade's cantata "The Crusaders," under the direction of Mr. J. H. Adams. On the 8th ult. Mr. Thomas Facer conducted a second performance, this time with orchestra, of his new cantata, "The Pilgrim Fathers." These concerts both formed part of the cheap Saturday evening entertainments given in the Town Hall.

During the week preceding Easter several performances of sacred music were given in various churches. On March 27, at St. Augustine's, Edgbaston, Mr. Gaul's "Holy City" was given, and on Good Friday the same composer's "Passion Service" was performed. Sir John Stainer's cantata "The Crucifixion" was given at the Church of St. Stephen, Selly Hill, on Good Friday, and the same evening the Passion music from Gounod's "Redemption" was performed at the Old Meeting Church.

A concert was given in the Masonic Hall on the 11th ult., the chief performers being the Ladies' Grecian Band of Harps and the Birmingham Madrigal Choir. This last made its first appearance, and, conducted by Mr. J. H. Adams, sang Pinsuti's "Spring Song," the madrigal "My Love is fair," and other pieces with good tone and fair finish. Mr. D. F. Davis contributed harp solos, and Mr. Montague Pollack, Miss Beatrice Vernon, Mr. John Walker, and Mr. and Mrs. Stockham took part in the programme.

On Wednesday, the 12th ult., Miss Margaret Johnson, a young local pianist, gave her first concert in the same room, with much success. She was assisted by Madame Gwen Cosslett, vocalist, and Mr. Johan C. Hock, violoncellist.

The last of Mr. Max Mossel's Drawing-room concerts was given in the Grand Hotel on March 23. The Bohemian String Quartet was responsible for the chief part of the programme, which comprised Beethoven's Quartet in C (Op. 59, No. 3), Dvorák's Quartet in F (Op. 96), and two movements from Grieg's Quartet (Op. 27). All were given with fine precision and warmth of expression. Madame Zippora Monteith contributed some well-chosen songs.

MUSIC IN BOURNEMOUTH.

COLERIDGE-TAYLOR'S BALLADE IN D MINOR FOR VIOLIN AND ORCHESTRA.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

Londoners of the present day hear Beethoven's symphonies played by orchestras of from eighty to a hundred players, which means that the proper balance between strings and wind, such as Beethoven had in his mind when he wrote his immortal works, is completely upset. We have to go beyond the Metropolis to hear them performed with the small "Beethoven orchestra" of the beginning of the century; and it was a new, and, we may add, delightful experience to us to listen to the great master's ever-fresh "No. 2" as interpreted, on the 17th ult., by the Municipal Orchestra, at the Bournemouth Winter Gardens, under the direction of its energetic and enthusiastic conductor, Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun. This capital band consists of thirty-eight performers—viz., twenty strings and eighteen wind and percussion. They play like true artists and seem competent to appear anywhere and do anything in the way of interpreting the utterances of the masters of music. They perform in a concert-room of such excellent acoustic properties that the faintest pianissimi of string or wind carry with charming effect to the farthest corner, the Tutti reveal a rich and full sonority without calling up even the semblance of an echo, and the fortissimi of the brass never degenerate into a noisy blare. Moreover, they display the finish and spirit of a highly trained and intelligent body of musicians, so that their performance of the aforesaid symphony came as a rare surprise to one who, from one year's end to the other, is condemned to listen to many ponderous battlings of huge orchestras with small scores of a dozen staves or so. There is nothing in a Beethoven symphony that a first-rate and perfectly balanced "small" band, such as Mr. Godfrey's, cannot do better, given a suitable room, than a modern "playing-machine" of a hundred men. That, at any rate, was our impression after the most enjoyable performance under notice, and it might be worth the consideration of London conductors to give us occasionally a Beethoven or Mozart symphony as nearly as possible under the conditions that obtained in those composers' days.

Mr. Godfrey makes a point of producing works by native musicians and inviting them to conduct their compositions; and it was the production for the first time in public (with orchestra) of a work by that rising young composer, Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, which took us to Bournemouth. The Ballade in D minor for violin and orchestra was composed some years ago, while Mr. Taylor was still a pupil of Professor Stanford. It was played for the first time in public, but only with pianoforte accompaniment, at one of the Musical Guild's concerts in Kensington Town Hall, in 1895, by Miss Isabella Donkersley. The work had been scored for small orchestra and tried at one of the Royal College rehearsals. Afterwards the score was sent to a well-known conductor who has it still, and when the suggestion of a performance at Bournemouth was made to the composer, he at once agreed to re-score the work, "rather than bother Mr. X. about returning the old score"! While engaged on this self-imposed and cheerfully-undertaken task, the young composer improved the shining hour by scoring his work for a larger orchestra, strengthening the melodic interest in various places in the Tutti, and generally brightening up the accompaniments. The result is a little work which, though not melodically so valuable as some of Mr. Taylor's more recent utterances, is yet so full of originality and, in places, of beauty, as to fully deserve repeated performances, especially as we can vouch from experience that it grows upon one with each fresh hearing. The piece is largely built on this impressive theme—given out in several octaves by clarinets, bassoons, horns, two trombones, and the lower strings. The five notes marked "a" are largely used as a figure of accompaniment and tossed about from instrument to instrument with excellent effect, some of the sonorously scored and spirited Tutti being also built upon them. The solo violin enters after the above quoted theme with a dignified recitative, which merges into a series of expressive cantabile passages of much originality, until the first short Tutti (Allegro) is reached. After this it busies itself with matter derived from the opening subject, new and interesting ideas being continually added, until after another fierce—in fact, somewhat wild—Tutti, the tranquil second subject is reached. This gives way in due course to a suave and beautiful little Episode (più Andante, 6-4) and another striking and richly scored Tutti leads to the recapitulation, in which, however, the interest is kept alive in that it differs in many little details from the exposition; it contains, in fact, further development of "a." The second subject having been duly repeated in the key of D major, a repetition of the recitative for the solo instrument leads to the Coda, in which the soloist is given the first chance of playing the opening theme in its entirety, molto espressivo, against throbbing, detached chords from the orchestra. This is an effective point, and it is only surpassed in interest when the solo violin gradually rises to its highest register, in which the theme of the Episode (now in 3-2) is broadly played ff to a pp tremolando accompaniment. The latter grows richer and richer till the final bars, in which both soloist and orchestra are busy with figure "a," the piece ending piano in a decidedly impressive manner. As we have said, Mr. Taylor has produced some finer works since he wrote this Ballade, yet it is distinctly valuable, both on its own account and because we seem to recognise in many places, ut ex ungue leonem, that gift of originality and strength which we prize in his later efforts. The work was introduced at Bournemouth by the lady (now Mrs. A. J. Jaeger) who first played it some years ago. Her beautiful tone and excellent technique were well displayed in it, and she left little or nothing to desire on the score of expression. Composer and soloist were heartily recalled after an excellent performance.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

Much interest was aroused in two renderings of the first part of Gounod's "Mors et Vita," with English words, at the Church of St. Stephen the Martyr—one on March 24 and the other on Good Friday, the choir being augmented on these occasions. The Rev. T. E. Houghton, rector, conducted. Outside help was obtained for the solos, which were delivered by Miss Furnival (soprano), Miss Barton (contralto), and Mr. G. Brierley (tenor). There was a small orchestra in addition to the organ.

The principal recent local event was the last concert of the season of the Bristol and Clifton Philharmonic Society on the 8th ult., at the Victoria Rooms. Choir and band numbered about 300, and the chief portion of the programme was directed by Mr. E. Pavey, Mr. Edward Cook, the other conductor of the Society, holding the baton during the interpretation of a part-song by Sir Joseph Barnby. The principal vocalists were Miss Eva Hartshorne (soprano) and Miss Eveline Gerrish (contralto), both of whom are Bristolians, and Mr. J. Dean Trotter (tenor), from Exeter Cathedral. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was the chief work presented. Subsequently Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor (Op. 70) was played, with Miss Gertrude Peppercorn in the pianoforte part. She had before appeared at one of the Society's concerts and obtained an enthusiastic reception. Later on she interpreted Liszt's Sixth Rhapsody.

On the 5th ult. a concert was given at Keynsham, in the Public Hall, in order to liquidate a debt on the Church of St. Margaret, Queen Charlton. The vocalists, principally from Bristol, were Miss Alice Boaden, Miss Gertrude Hember, Mr. A. Matthews, and Mr. S. Bishop.

The Choral Society at Berkeley, whose president is Lord Fitzhardinge, gave a concert in the large hall of the Castle on the 7th ult. The Hon. Percy Armitage, nephew of Lord Fitzhardinge, who is an enthusiastic amateur, takes considerable interest in the choir, and there was a large and fashionable attendance. Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was given, the soloists being Miss Marion Harris, soprano, of Bristol; Mrs. W. Legge, an amateur contralto; Mr. T. H. Brearley, tenor, of the Leeds choir; and Mr. F. Millman, baritone, of Kingswood, near Wotton-under-Edge. Mr. W. Woodcock, organist of the Parish Church, conducted the performance. Miss Trotter, a relative of Lord Fitzhardinge, skilfully executed some solos for the violin. The concert, which was held in the afternoon, was repeated at night.

Midsomer Norton Choral Society gave its annual concert on the 11th ult., under the direction of Mr. W. J. Kidner, of Bristol. The soloists were Miss F. Cromey, Mrs. King, Mr. C. Gregory, and Mr. R. F. Bennett. A miscellaneous programme was presented, the principal features being Mendelssohn's Forty-second Psalm and Mr. A. R. Gaul's choral cantata "A Song of Life."

Mr. Edward Cook, of Bristol, is conductor of the Clevedon Philharmonic Society, which, on the 12th ult., brought its season to a close with a performance of Mr. J. F. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" and a miscellaneous selection. The principal vocalists were the Misses Eveline and Katherine Gerrish (Bristol), Captain Trestrail (who is honorary secretary of the Society), and Mr. Arthur Wills. There was a small orchestra, with Mr. F. S. Gardner holding the principal first violin.

On the following night Mr. E. Cook's other choir, the Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, gave a concert in the Victoria Hall. The chief works presented were Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and Stanford's "Revenge." Owing to indisposition, Madame Adelaide Mullen, who had been announced to sing the music of Elsie in the former work, was replaced by Miss Marjorie Eaton, of Ashton-under-Lyne. The other soloists were Miss Ada Bennett, Mr. Whitworth Mitton, and Mr. Montague Worlock. In the band were several Bristol professionals, and Mr. W. Darby was at the organ.

On the 18th ult. the fourth annual concert of the Radstock and District Choral Society was held, when a portion of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was presented, with Miss Louise Burns, Miss Mary Wood, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. R. A. Grant as soloists. The conductor was Mr. H. T. Sims.

Bath Choral and Orchestral Society, on the previous day, gave the oratorio with the same principals. Mr. Watkin Mills had been engaged, but, though present, could not sing, as he suffered from laryngitis, and his place was taken by Mr. Grant, of Wells Cathedral. Mr. J. W. Duys held the principal first violin and Mr. H. T. Sims directed the performance.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

Lovers of true liturgical music must have been gratified by the admirable rendering of the "Responsoria" of Palestrina and Vittoria, sung at Tenebræ during Passion week in St. Teresa's Church, Clarendon Street. The choir, which was specially engaged, consisted of the boys in St. Mary's Place Christian Brothers' National School and about twenty tenors and basses, and was trained by Mr. Vincent O'Brien, the talented organist of the church. The difficulties of the music are very great, and too much credit cannot be given to Mr. O'Brien for the skill with which he has already transformed the immature material of the national school boy into an instrument of refined and æsthetic calibre. The truly noble and devotional music was heard probably for the first time in Ireland, and we only wish it was more frequently performed both inside and outside the churches. Some day we may be able to boast of a school of Church music which, in time, may equal the traditions of the old Pontifical Choir, that nursery of so many musicians.

The Hallé Orchestra gave two concerts in Dublin on the 11th and 12th ult., in the Round Room of the Rotunda, a detestable place, it must be said, for concerts of this description, the low roof and the prominence of the platform and the players making the sound almost ear-splitting in the forte passages. The net result of the two concerts is a grateful memory of the Pastoral Symphony and the "Leonora" (No. 3) Overture of Beethoven, the "Genoveva" Overture of Schumann, the "Unfinished" Symphony of Schubert, and the "Waldweben" music from Wagner's "Siegfried." The second part of the first concert consisted entirely of Wagner's music. The outlook in music at present appears to be blocked by Wagner and his devotees. One longs for the time when the vista will be cleared of the insane admiration and excitement for Wagner, when we can judge dispassionately, and separate the grain from the chaff in the enormous bulk of his work. Already one feels he is most impressive when he is least important and self-conscious, that all the enormous brass and percussion effects must eventually find their value and be relegated to the regions lower than "the ampler ether and diviner air" of great art. One must only live through Wagnerism as one lived through the extravagances of the æsthetic school some years ago. But just as the latter has left an indelible impression on the decorative art of to-day, so, when estimated at his true worth, will Wagner be found to have contributed something new to the records of music, and the future musician will start on a higher plane of evolution. This moderate estimate, however, is surely treason to the "perfect Wagnerite," whose deity is to him the apotheosis and consummation of finality in the art of music.

We are glad to see that the Feis Ceoil committee has secured the services of Signor Esposito and his orchestra for the concert of the 18th inst., when some of the prize compositions and Sir Robert Stewart's "Eve of St. John" are to be performed. The competitions and concerts of the Feis Ceoil will be held during the third week of the present month.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

For the benefit of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children the Norwich Orchestral Union devoted its concert given in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich, on the 13th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Ernest Harcourt. A new composition for orchestra and chorus from the pen of the conductor was given for the first time, the subject being "Mors janua vitæ." An altogether charming rendering of two movements (Andante and Scherzo) from Mendelssohn's D minor Pianoforte Trio was given by Messrs. Kingston Rudd, G. H. Betjemann, and H. Whitehouse, the two latter gentlemen being heard also in several violin and violoncello solos.

Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung at a special service held in St. Gregory's Church, Norwich, on the afternoon of Palm Sunday, in a highly creditable manner, by the usual church choir, under the guidance of Mr. G. E. Harris, the choirmaster, Mr. E. Bryant officiating at the organ. The same work was also given at Christ Church, Eaton, on the evening of the same day, the tenor and bass solos being sung by Mr. Sawford Dye and Mr. F. T. Moffitt.

The Great Yarmouth Musical Society was responsible for an unusually good performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on the 13th ult. The satisfactory result attained by principals, chorus, and band received deservedly warm approbation from the large audience present. The dramatic numbers of the oratorio were sung with commendable spirit—in fact, the entire performance was a proof that, under the careful training of Mr. Haydon Hare, the Society has made rapid strides and added considerably to its reputation. Mr. Dan Price, in the rôle of the Prophet, raised the enthusiasm of the audience to a high pitch by the skill with which he declaimed his part. The other principal singers, Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss L. Fydell, and Mr. E. Dunkerton, added much to the pleasure of the performance.

The Downham Market Choral Society deserves thanks for bringing forward Handel's "Samson" at its concert on March 23 (too late for insertion in our last number), for it certainly stands in the front rank of the master's choral works. Thanks to the pains taken by Mr. G. H. Harvey at rehearsals, the choruses went with spirit, while the band, led by Mr. Jackson, gave a good account of the accompaniments. The principal vocalists were Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Edith Nutter, Mr. T. H. Brearley, and Mr. John Browning.

A performance of Gounod's "Redemption" (Part I.) was given in St. Edmund's Church, Downham Market, on Good Friday, in the presence of a large congregation. The choir was augmented by sopranos and contraltos from the Downham Choral Society. The Rev. F. J. B. Hart reverently sang the music allotted to the part of the Saviour; the other solos being well interpreted by the following members of the choir: Messrs. A. J. Davies, E. T. Andrews (tenor and bass Narrators), H. Wilson, and J. J. Parratt. Mr. G. H. Harvey presided at the organ.

The Hunstanton Choral Society closed its ninth season on the 5th ult., Handel's "Acis and Galatea" being the work undertaken. Mr. Arthur H. Cross conducted, the band and chorus, numbering about 120. Miss Clara Dow, Mr. H. Springall, and Mr. Courtier Dutton were the principal vocalists, and a very successful concert may be recorded.

On the 15th ult. Hunstanton Town Hall was the scene of an interesting children's competition in connection with the North-West Norfolk Association of Village Choirs. The first contest was for the best sight reading of a piece in one part by a choir of not less than twelve voices, each child to be under eight years of age. The choir from Hunstanton St. Edmund's Board School (Miss Messner) was adjudged the winner. The second contest was for children under sixteen years of age, sight-singing for a piece in two parts by choirs of not less than twelve voices. The first prize went to Thornham (Mr. Elsum) and the second to Hunstanton St. Edmund's (Mr. Mallett). The competitions were continued on the 17th ult., several being very closely contested. Mr. Summerley acted as adjudicator.

The choir of Framlingham College was sufficiently ambitious to sing the Prologue and Part I. of Gounod's "Redemption" in the College Chapel on Thursday in Holy week, under the superintendence of Mr. C. H. Duffield, the choirmaster, and conspicuous success attended the effort. Mr. Ernest Hodgson and Mr. Alfred Pretty were the principal soloists.

Gaul's "Joan of Arc" was the work chosen to close the seventh season of the Felixstowe Choral Society at its concert given on the 5th ult. The principal exponents of this pleasing work were Mrs. Emma Pretty, Mr. S. Masters, and Dr. Havell. Mr. T. Palmer very successfully conducted.

Good Friday was generally observed in East Anglia by the performance of music suitable to the sacred day. In Norwich "The Messiah" was given as usual in St. Andrew's Hall, in the afternoon, under the direction of Drs. Bunnett and Hill, for the benefit of local charities. In the evening Mr. H. F. Howlett's orchestral band of working girls gave a miscellaneous sacred concert in the Agricultural Hall Assembly Room.

At Great Yarmouth Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung in St. Nicholas Church, and a miscellaneous sacred concert took place in the Aquarium. At Lowestoft Mr. H. D. Flower, organist of the Parish Church, conducted "The Messiah" in that building. In many other centres equally praiseworthy services were held.

In addition to the usual services at Norwich Cathedral on Easter Day, a special one was held in the afternoon at which selections from "The Messiah" and "Redemption," with orchestral accompaniments, were included.

The initial concert, under the auspices of the re-formed Ipswich Choral Society, took place on the 20th ult., when Costa's "Eli" was given with much success, under the direction of Mr. Bunnell Burton. The chorus, numbering over 200 voices, was supported by a string band, led by Mr. Charles Cooke, while the soloists comprised Miss Marie Roberts, Mr. and Mrs. King Smith, Master Stanley Baxter, Mr. Elliott Hooper, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. W. Hockey, Mr. A. E. Scales, and Mr. Santley.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(From our own Correspondent.)

On March 27 Mr. Kirkhope's choir gave its annual Spring concert. Quite a gloom was cast over the performance by the absence of Mr. Kirkhope, whose father died on the same afternoon; and the choir seemed to introduce quite a personal feeling of tribute to its loved conductor in the sympathetic rendering it gave of Dr. Stanford's "Elegiac Ode." Bach was represented for the first time in Mr. Kirkhope's programmes by "A Stronghold Sure" and "I wrestle and pray," and in the massive part-writing the full volume of tone at the choir's command was heard to great advantage. The choir was also successful in its treatment of Mendelssohn's 98th Psalm. The soloists were Miss Nicholls, Miss Anita Sutherland, Mr. William Green (who sang Parry's splendid song from "Judith," "God breaketh the battle"), and Mr. Watkin Mills, who scored a success in Handel's "Droop not, young lover."

On March 24 the "St. Matthew" Passion was given at St. Mary's Cathedral, under Mr. Collinson's careful direction. The rendering of the work steadily improves from year to year, and this year it showed quite a marked advance on those of previous Passiontides.

On March 30 M. Paderewski paid us his first visit for four years and showed in his magnetic personality and magnificent interpretations of the "Appassionata" and the Brahms-Handel Variations all the old power over his audience.

At the last of Mr. Denhof's chamber concerts, on March 25, a large audience was attracted to hear the carefully arranged programme. Mr. Sons was first violinist, and Miss Clara Butt, as vocalist, gave great pleasure in English and German songs.

On the 4th ult. the Queen Street Hall was well filled to hear the annual concert of Mr. Millar Craig's choir. Bach, after so many years' neglect, has been very much in evidence at choral concerts this season, and his motet, "Jesus, priceless Treasure," was the first number on this programme. MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter" was sung with great spirit, and so was Grieg's interesting "Scenes from Olaf Trygvason" (Op. 50). The programme also included an intricate "Salve, Regina," by Papperitz, as well as solos and duets by Mrs. Millar Craig, the Misses Yerbury, and other members of the choir.

At the University Graduation ceremony in the McEwan Hall, on the 14th ult., Professor Niecks presented Dr. Hugo Riemann for the honorary degree of Doctor in Music. Dr. Riemann is the third musician who has been so honoured by the Senatus since the Faculty of Music was instituted on Professor Niecks's appointment to the Reid Chair. His predecessors were Professor Ebenezer Prout and Sir Alexander Mackenzie. Professor Niecks also presented two students—Miss Agnes Johnstone and Miss Struthers—for the degree of Bachelor in Music. The examiners for the degree were Professor Niecks, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and Mr. Franklin Peterson.

The Robert Cunningham Opera Company made its first appearance at the Theatre Royal, on the 10th ult., when Mr. Reginald Somerville's opera "The Three Musketeers" was introduced here, and its attractive music was much appreciated. The same composer's short opera "The 'Prentice Pillar," produced on the 12th ult., was still more favourably received, the composer showing in this work a distinct gift of melody and the power of writing effectively for the orchestra. The general performance was, on the whole, good. The répertoire of the Company during the week included several of the best known operas.

MUSIC IN HEREFORD.

(From a Correspondent.)

The great improvement that has taken place in musical culture in the city and county of Hereford of late years is undoubtedly due to the ability and energy of Mr. G. R.

Sinclair, organist of Hereford Cathedral and conductor of the Hereford Triennial Three Choirs Festivals. The concerts given by the Hereford Choral Society and the Herefordshire Orchestral Society are far above the average of provincial concerts. The Choral Society in particular has reached a very high standard of efficiency, and the choral singing is remarkable for freshness and vigour combined with delicacy and attention to light and shade. Its finished singing was displayed to advantage in the excellent performance of "The Damnation of Faust," by Hector Berlioz, which was given in the Shire Hall, on the 11th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. G. R. Sinclair. The rendering of the whole work was very dramatic and showed that both singers and players entered thoroughly into the spirit of the work; the intonation and attack of the chorus were worthy of the highest praise, and evidenced not only hard work and zeal on their part, but the excellent training they had received. The playing of the orchestra was also very good. The band was composed partly of amateurs and partly of professional players from London; and certainly a better instrumental force has never been heard in Hereford except at the Three Choirs Festival. The soloists were Miss Maggie Purvis, Mr. William Green, Mr. Daniel Price (who specially distinguished himself by his dramatic rendering of the important part of Mephistopheles), and Mr. Fred. Lightowler. Great credit is due to all concerned in the performance, and especially to the conductor for the great pains he had taken in preparing the work for performance.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The Liverpool Orchestral Society brought a not unsuccessful season to a close on the 23rd ult., by a concert having a decided claim to musical interest. Two of the works chosen—the "Saul" dramatic overture of Mr. Granville Bantock and the "Scandinavian" Symphony of Mr. F. H. Cowen—were played under the direction of their respective composers. Mr. Bantock's overture, produced at the Chester Festival in 1897, is scored for a full orchestra, with passages for triangle, harp, and organ. The organ effects, dignified and massive, and warlike in inspiration, are contrasted with suave passages for the oboes. The chief interest, however, of this concert was Tschaïkowsky's Violin Concerto, which, though introduced at a Richter concert in London quite twelve years ago, was, on this occasion, heard in Liverpool for the first time. Mr. Adolph Brodsky, to whom the concerto was dedicated by the composer, was the violinist.

In the course of a brief visit to Liverpool during the last week of March, the National Opera Company produced Mr. R. Somerville's opera "The Three Musketeers." This work, which contains some pleasant writing, was received favourably. Good Friday was marked by a performance on the part of the Liverpool Musical Society of "The Redemption." Miss Blanche Gordon made a successful initial appearance in oratorio as a contralto. The remaining principals were Miss Mary Beynon, Madame Edith Wynne, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. F. H. Crossley conducted. The performance was of commendable merit. On the same day Mr. H. A. Branscombe conducted, at St. George's Hall, a performance of "The Messiah," both choir and principals being volunteers. Madame Laura Haworth, Miss Ada Phillips, and Messrs. T. Barlow and E. B. Haddock sang the solos.

One or two interesting Welsh Festivals must also be included among local events. A spirited competition of male-voice choirs took place, on the 3rd ult., at an Eisteddfod at Birkenhead. Five choirs entered. The prize, twelve guineas and a silver cup presented by Mr. W. H. Lever, of Bromboro', was won by the choir from Manchester. At the seventh annual Festival, on the 11th ult., of Welsh congregational choirs in Liverpool and the neighbourhood, part was taken by some twelve choirs forming an aggregate body of about eight hundred singers. An interesting programme of choral music was gone through. The musical season, locally, is now practically at an end; but one of its pleasant and interesting features has been the series of pianoforte recitals by Mr. H. Steudner Welsing, who, mainly for the benefit of students, played through the Suites of Bach and the Etudes of Chopin, a selection from each composer alternately. Mr. Welsing gave his last recital on the 27th ult.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual public examinations of the students of our Royal College of Music were held too near the end of March to allow of their being adequately noticed in our April issue, and were far too important to be passed over without due record. In previous years, in addition to the pleasant fortnightly open practices, the friends of the Institution have been invited, immediately before the long vacation, to attend the somewhat more ambitious performances showing the progress made during the session then closing. But some inconvenience was caused by the crowding together, in the opening weeks of July, of the public demonstrations and the careful private examination of each pupil or class held in all departments by experienced judges; and, experimentally at least, it was deemed desirable, by devoting three consecutive evenings immediately before the close of the middle section of the academic year to the more public inspection, to leave the end of the third term free for the calmer survey by examiners and professors of the condition of their pupils and for such finishing instruction as might be deemed advisable. Thus, this year's concerts must be regarded as tests of the progress achieved during only two-thirds of an annual course of study; and some further allowance must be made for the unusual difficulties caused by the virulence of the prevailing epidemic, which has so disturbed plans that from one evening's designed programme alone no fewer than four out of six of the proposed performers had, almost at the last moment, to be excused. Perhaps nothing could more clearly show the satisfactory condition of the College than the fact that not the slightest inconvenience was caused; but that opportunities were thus afforded for bringing forward many of the more advanced of the junior pupils to whom it would otherwise have been impossible to assign places in programmes already too long. Two evenings—those of March 20 and 21—were given up for solo work and for selections from the chamber music so well prepared in the ensemble class of Mr. Carl Fuchs; the third evening being devoted to the performances of the College orchestra, ably directed by the principal, Mr. Brodsky. The programme of this closing meeting was very well chosen, including Brahms's Symphony (No. 4) in E minor, which showed how seriously the minds of the students are directed; Mendelssohn's picturesque "Meeresstille" Overture; and, for the first time in Manchester, Reinecke's Serenade for strings, which afforded ample opportunity for testing the capacity and strength of that department of the orchestra, which must, inevitably, for some years be more complete than either the wood-wind or the brass section. Of the concerted chamber music selected, the rendering of Smetana's Op. 15 and of the first Pianoforte Trio of Beethoven must be specially commended. Much of the solo work showed far more than bare promise of future excellence; for some of it gave token of musical feeling already rapidly developing, in addition to mere executive ability. The violin playing of Arthur Catterall, Clara Kloberg, and Jessie Morris—all studying under Mr. Brodsky—was in every respect admirable; the octave playing of Miss Kloberg in the D minor Concerto of Vieuxtemps being exceptionally true. Among the pianists, Lily Greenhalgh (pupil of Miss Néruda) and Edith Brown (Mr. Dayas) were particularly successful; while Lilian Risque and Elizabeth Muirhead appealed to those hearers sufficiently experienced in the technic of the instrument to appreciate clearness of executive skill and delicacy of touch, in spite of the rather unwise selection of pieces. Mr. Pyne's pupil—James Armistead—played Mendelssohn's third Organ Sonata in a manner leaving little to be desired except a somewhat greater variety of registering. Among the singing pupils of Mrs. Hutchinson and of Mr. Ford, Ruby Keighley displayed a capital contralto voice and a quiet self-control which enabled her to give a finished and effective rendering of Handel's "Return, O God of Hosts"; and both Harriet Bolton and Sarah Andrew possess rich-toned young voices which ought to be turned to good account. Ada Frodsham also has a good natural endowment, but we were surprised to hear an unsteadiness of tone tolerated in an institution where the vibrato is expressly forbidden by the rules. The choir of the College took no part in the performance of either evening.

As is well known, the composition department is controlled by the acting Professor of the Victoria University, who is energetically assisted by Messrs. Walter Carroll and Thomas Keighley, both graduates of that University; and it is so arranged as to allow the more advanced and ambitious students to pass through Owens College classes, with a view to graduation. From the "exercises" of several of those who have so passed selections have, at various times, been made, which would have been publicly presented had the facilities of the College allowed. Of course, it would be possible to obtain the assistance of male voices from outside; but hitherto, not unnaturally, it has been considered advisable to depend entirely upon the resources of the College itself. No avowed "composition student" has yet been admitted; but, by many even of those who are required to make harmony merely a secondary study, and to pursue it only sufficiently to gain, when leaving the College, the general certificate of qualification as a vocalist or an instrumentalist, evidence has been shown of dawning imaginative powers and of ability to write in a more secular or free style than University requirements exact. The time which such students are able to devote to composition is, necessarily, very limited; but it is extremely desirable that every encouragement should be afforded to all those who display any natural aptitude for composition or for deeper study of the construction of music; and it is hoped that the growing success of the young institution may lead to due provision being made for the maturing of what should be its highest department, although, unhappily, not that one which appeals most directly to the general public.

Among the miscellaneous concerts of the closing season, Dr. Watson's production of Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" must be noted as a most interesting feature in the concluding programme of the Vocal Society. Mr. Carl Fuchs again brought, on March 25, to the Schiller Hall, where he so ably directs the music, the celebrated Bohemian String Quartet party, which so charmed us last winter by the splendid resonance of the four instruments, the absolute unity of purpose which actuates the players, and the ability whereby the intricacies of the most complicated modern chamber works are clearly unfolded. Anything more powerful and masterly than the interpretation of Smetana's "Aus mein Leben" it would be impossible to conceive.

With the visit of M. Paderewski the activity of our musical season ceased. How strange it is that every pianist must commence his recital by torturing an organ fugue to the neglect of all the masterly works which Bach wrote for the clavichord, many of them far more interesting and less formal in construction. Schumann's "Carnaval" scenes, also, seem to be necessary in every programme; the reason not being obvious. Nothing could be more brilliant and varied than M. Paderewski's rendering; but these pieces, certainly, were not the most enjoyable. As an exponent of Chopin, his fellow-countryman, naturally, is pre-eminent; and the ease with which all the intricacies of the showy modern school were surmounted aroused the warmest enthusiasm of a crowded audience.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Durham College of Science Choral Society gave its seventh annual concert in the College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on March 24, performing on the occasion Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" and Mackenzie's "The Bride." Both works were very creditably performed, under the conductorship of Mr. W. Gillies Whittaker. The soloists were Miss Maggie Wilson, Miss Grace Carson, Mr. L. C. Guthrie, and Mr. Wm. Lyall. Miss E. Simey presided at the pianoforte and Mr. C. F. Bowes at the organ.

A portion of Gounod's "Redemption" was given in the Cathedral, Newcastle, on Good Friday, before a very large congregation. The solos were sung by members of the Cathedral choir, who proved to be fully equal to the occasion. The choruses were effectively sung, and the entire performance reflected credit upon Mr. J. E. Jeffries, the Cathedral organist, who presided at the organ.

Mr. C. Lee Williams's cantata "Gethsemane" received a very praiseworthy rendering at the hands of the choir of St. Peter's Church, Newcastle, on Good Friday. There was a small orchestra, Mr. Docksey presided at the organ, and Mr. T. W. Ritson, the organist of the church, conducted.

Numerous performances of Stainer's "Crucifixion" took place in this locality also on Good Friday, notably one at St. Thomas's Church, Sunderland, under the direction of Mr. George F. Vincent, which was very largely attended and greatly appreciated.

On the 11th ult. Barnby's sacred cantata "Rebekah" was performed in the Miners' Hall, Hetton-le-Hole, by the Hetton Church Choral Society, under the conductorship of the Rev. C. H. Newman. The solos were sung by Mrs. T. W. Hodges, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. W. Walton, and the performance was quite successful. Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was also included in the programme.

On the same date, the 11th ult., a successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given in the Corn Exchange, Berwick, by the Berwick Choral Union, with Miss Roscoe, Miss Green, Mr. Wild, and Mr. Dan Billington as soloists. There was a small orchestra, and Mr. W. Green conducted.

An exceptionally interesting concert was given on the 12th ult., by the Middlesbrough Musical Union, in the Town Hall, Middlesbrough, the principal feature being the performance, under the conductorship of the composer, of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast." This work has quite established Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's reputation in the Northern counties as a composer who, having something to say, knows how to express himself in musical language of an original and interesting character. On the present occasion the work was performed under very favourable circumstances, the beautiful tenor solo, "Onaway! awake, beloved!" being sung by Mr. Edward Lloyd. Chorus and orchestra exerted themselves with excellent results, doubtless inspired by the presence of the composer, who, at the close of the performance, received quite an ovation. Mr. Coleridge-Taylor also conducted his Ballade in A minor for orchestra; the remainder of the programme, including Edward Elgar's "Banner of St. George," being under the direction of Mr. N. Kilburn, the conductor of the Society. Mr. Felix Corbett gave an excellent performance of Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor.

Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" was also performed by the Bishop Auckland Musical Society on the 5th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. N. Kilburn, and was received with much enthusiasm. As the resources of this Society are by no means exceptional, its successful performance of the cantata proves that the work is within the reach of any choral society of ordinary attainments.

On the 13th ult. Mr. N. Kilburn was presented by the members and friends of the Sunderland Philharmonic Society with a massive silver bowl and a very handsome clock, in recognition of his services as honorary conductor of the Society for a period of thirteen years. Mrs. Kilburn was also presented on the same occasion with a very chaste necklet of pearls and diamonds.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

The Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society concluded its season, on March 23, with a magnificent performance of "Elijah." With such artists as Madame Ella Russell, Miss Hilda Wilson, and Mr. Andrew Black, the respective solos were in safe hands, and the tenor music was given by Mr. William Green, whose beautiful voice and artistic method were fully appreciated. Madame Jeannie Bentley, Miss Nellie Wright, Mr. Greatorex, and Mr. Walker, all members of the Society, assisted in the double quartet. The chorus sang, as it always does in this work, with vigour and brightness. Mr. Henry J. Wood conducted a masterly performance, which, if it erred on any side, was too emotional in the dramatic scenes, and therefore in danger of becoming what Mendelssohn himself described as a "biblical Walpurgisnacht."

On March 28 Messrs. Ellenberger and Thorpe gave a chamber concert, assisted by Miss K. Ellenberger (pianoforte) and Mr. G. F. Johnson (viola). The programme included Mozart's String Trio, Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonata in A flat (Op. 110), Mendelssohn's Romance in D for violoncello, and Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat. In addition to the above, Mr. Ellenberger contributed a novelty, so far as Nottingham is concerned, with a performance of Kreuz's "Russian Dances." We regret to say that Nottingham does not support these concerts as the works presented and the performances thereof deserve.

Mr. Ford Waltham gave a vocal recital on the 13th ult., assisted by Miss Gertrude Crisp, Mr. B. Withers (violoncello), and Mr. Oaksford (accompanist). Mr. Ford Waltham received a warm recall for his dramatic rendering of Korbay's "Hungarian Songs," which alike suit his voice and style. A special word of praise is due to Mr. Withers for the fine rendering of his violoncello solos.

Mr. H. S. Irons, the well-known organist of St. Andrew's Church, gave a recital on the 13th ult., which included works by Mendelssohn, Beethoven, and Bach, representing the classics, and Delbruch, Silas, and Wolstenholme representing modern writers.

As showing the gradual development of choral singing in the provinces, mention should be made of the performance of "Elijah," at Ashburn, on March 23, under the direction of Mr. W. H. Tutt; as well as the performance of "St. Paul" by the Worksworth Choral Society, on the same date, conducted by Mr. Carl Ashover.

MUSIC IN PLYMOUTH.

(From a Correspondent.)

The first performance, on the 12th ult., of Dr. S. Weekes's oratorio "Nehemiah" excited great interest, and was attended by a crowded audience. The chorus, a well-balanced body of about 300 voices, and band of ninety consisted of Dr. Weekes's Choral and Orchestral Societies, supplemented by members of the Cornwall County Choral Society and several of the other Plymouth choral associations, and was conducted with marked ability by Mr. Walter Weekes, son of the composer, Dr. Weekes not being sufficiently recovered from a serious illness to take the direction of his work. The overture, a fine and well-developed movement, is based upon two themes, the first of which, expressive of the determined character of Nehemiah, is made frequent use of throughout the oratorio in connection with his various appearances. The second theme represents a vision or remembrance of Zion in its former beauty and re-appears towards the end of the work in a quartet and chorus, "Zion, our loved home." The overture leads without break into the opening chorus (for double choir), "Lord, Thou art wrath." This is one of the finest numbers of the work, opening with massive antiphonal effects for the two choirs, followed by a well worked eight-part fugue. Another extremely fine chorus is No. 8, "Who is among you that feareth the Lord"; it is full of energy and vigour, with most fluent part-writing and some striking harmonic changes. In the second part a march and chorus (Nehemiah and his people on their way to rebuild the city walls), interrupted by a halt outside the temple, from which is heard a choral accompanied by organ, proved a most popular number, and was so persistently encored that it had to be repeated. The chorus with quartet (No. 26), "Vengeance is Mine," is specially noteworthy on account of the massive scoring of the commencement, the quiet contrast of the quartet, and the subsequent skilful blending of the soprano and tenor solo voices with the chorus. A fine group of choral numbers concludes the oratorio—viz., the quartet and chorus on the "Zion" theme, which is given first by the quartet in harmony and repeated in unison by the chorus; bass solo and chorus, "Stand up and bless"; and the final double chorus, with an elaborate eight-part fugue and an effective and imposing climax.

The solo and concerted portions of the work present much interest, both from the expressive and at times highly dramatic setting of the words and on account of the skilful and appropriate orchestration. The principal movements for solo voices are the Prayer (No. 3) for contralto, admirably sung by Madame Marian McKenzie; the tenor air, "He hath broken the gates of brass," in which Mr. Whitworth Mitton displayed a fresh clear voice and easy delivery; the soprano song, "Trust in Him," brilliantly given by Madame Ella Russell, for whose voice it was exactly suited; and the music for Nehemiah, of which Mr. Watkin Mills's conception and rendering were excellent, notably in the song (No. 13), "Blessed be the Lord," and the pathetic and beautiful aria, "Zion doth mourn." Mention should also be made of a charming unaccompanied quartet, "Be thou faithful," and the dramatic trio for the two Samaritans and Nehemiah, in which the contrast between the jeering taunts of the former and the calm confidence of the latter are well contrasted. A very effective "Persian March," with "local colour" supplied by the character of the music and by the addition of tom-toms, tambourine, triangle, &c., to the score, formed an attractive feature in the first part.

Altogether the oratorio is a work of great distinction, and well worth the attention of choral societies with sufficient means to deal with the double choruses, while it is not too much to say that the performance was superb and reflected the utmost credit on all concerned, especially the young conductor, on whom the main part of the work of preparation had fallen. Dr. Weekes, who was present, received such an enthusiastic ovation as amply testified at once to the success of his work and the esteem and affection felt for him both by the performers and the public, among whom he has laboured in the cause of music for nearly forty years.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The Hoyland Common and District Choral Society gave a successful concert in the Theatre on the 13th ult. Under the direction of Mr. G. M. Coates, an excellent rendering of Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was enjoyed by a large audience. The chorus, numbering about one hundred and fifty, did themselves and their conductor great credit. The principals were Madame Norledge, Miss Hoole, Mr. Tom Child, and Mr. Charles Knowles. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the band and Mr. Soar accompanied.

Stanford's "The Revenge" was performed to a large audience in the Retford Town Hall, on the 13th ult., by the Retford Vocal and Instrumental Society. Mr. Hamilton White conducted.

On the same evening the Buxton Choral Society performed the "Creation" under Mr. F. Burgiss. The work was rendered in an adequate manner and the singing of the chorus throughout was equal to the best traditions of Derbyshire choral singing. Miss Maggie Jaques, Mr. T. H. Brearley, and Mr. J. Lycett were the soloists. Mr. David Clegg (organist) and Mr. G. H. Lockett (pianist) also did excellent work.

The Heeley Orchestral Society, directed by Mr. W. Chapman, and the Brincliffe Musical Society, conducted by Mr. J. H. Parkes, have given successful concerts during the past month.

The Sheffield Choral Union performed Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" on the 18th ult., in the Music Hall, Surrey Street. Directed by Mr. S. Suckley, the performance was creditable in every respect. The sopranos and contraltos sang especially well in the chorus of Heathen Maidens and Christians, and the entire choir gave an excellent rendering of the chorus "Brother, thou art gone before us." The principals were Miss E. S. Hutchinson, Mrs. Vazson, Mr. R. Thompson, and Mr. W. Nicholls. Mr. W. Mason led the band. On the same date Bennett's "May Queen" was admirably performed by the St. Peter's (Abbeydale) Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. William Gadsby.

The Norton Lees Choral Society, conducted by Mr. W. H. Robinson, gave a concert on the 21st ult., at which the chief item was F. C. Wood's cantata "King Harold."

Bennett's "May Queen" was performed on the same date by the University Musical Society, directed by Dr. Coward. The last concert of a busy month took place on the 27th ult., when the Amateur Instrumental Society gave a concert, under Dr. Coward. Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony and works by Berlioz, Weber, Matt, Bellini, and Hérold were announced on the programme.

MUSIC IN STAFFORDSHIRE.

Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was performed for the first time in Stafford, in St. Mary's Collegiate Church, on March 29. The solos were entrusted to members of the choir and merited high praise. A feature which reflected great credit was the rendering of the duet "So Thou liftest," by Messrs. Whittle and Ball. The choruses were effectively sung. Mr. Sidney Taylor, deputy-organist, presided at the organ, and Dr. E. W. Taylor, organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

The Wolverhampton Festival Choral Society gave its last concert of the thirty-first season on the 10th ult., under the conductorship of Dr. Swinnerton Heap. The work chosen was Berlioz's "Faust," which requires courage and ability on the part of a choral society to undertake successfully. On this occasion the result was highly creditable to soloists, chorus, and conductor. At the last moment it was announced that Mr. Watkin Mills was ill and unable to sing; but Dr. Heap, with that fertility of resource for which he is noted, offered to fill in the parts allotted to the rôle of Mephistopheles, which, considering the short notice, he excellently carried out. The remaining solo work was in the capable hands of Miss Rosina Hammacott, Mr. Charles Saunders, and Mr. William Evans.

MUSIC IN WALES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The musical activity of Wales, especially what is familiarly called Welsh Wales, is largely confined to the field of competition, and Easter is only second to Christmas as to the number of its Eisteddfodic contests.

This year, as usual, a number of more or less important Eisteddfodau were held in various parts of North and South Wales, the chief being at Mountain Ash, Tonypandy, Abergavenny, and Pembroke Dock. At Mountain Ash, Sir Hubert Parry adjudicated, it being his first appearance in Wales in that capacity. He emphasised what has been repeatedly pointed out by native musical judges, the necessity of self-control and restraint, and condemned the excessive and inartistic use of what he termed "the jingling piano"—to accompany all manner of compositions.

In the opinion of many, this competitive spirit, so extensively displayed as it is in Wales, is not an unmixed good, notwithstanding what the Eisteddfod has done for music within its borders. The continual selection of the same well-known choruses by certain of the great masters, and glees and anthems by Welsh composers, can hardly make for real musical development. Unfortunately, as long as Eisteddfodau are held with the object of making money, as they almost invariably are, committees will be to a large extent under the "tyranny of the choirs" and their conductors, who prefer the repetition of stereotyped and familiar pieces to the effort involved in mastering what is new and less hackneyed.

The well-wishers of the Eisteddfod and of music in the Principality have faith, however, for one thing, in the development—sure, if slow—of instrumental music as an indirect antidote to this inertness and one-sidedness; and it is to be hoped that the forthcoming National Eisteddfod at Cardiff, where important instrumental prizes are offered, may conduce towards that end.

The Cardiff Musical Society brought its tenth season to a close on the 12th ult., with a successful rendering of Elgar's "King Olaf," under the conductorship of Mr. T. E. Aylward. Chorus and orchestra numbered over 300, and the performance of this striking work gave evident satisfaction to a crowded audience. The soloists were Miss Alice Esty, Mr. William Green, and Mr. Charles Copland.

It is satisfactory to learn that the funds necessary for establishing a musical lectureship at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, have been secured, and with but little difficulty. Mr. D. Jenkins, the appointed lecturer, has been doing much good, if unostentatious work in connection with the College for some years past, and the lectureship will add to his opportunities for extended effort on behalf of musical culture.

The recent performance of Gounod's "Redemption" by the College choir, under Mr. Jenkins's baton, was very successful, this being the Society's sixteenth performance of a complete work. The principal vocalists were Miss Marion Isaac, Miss E. M. Owen, Mr. Trevor Evans, and Mr. Meurig James, the orchestra being led by Mr. Hulley, Swansea.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

Both the variety and excellence of the Leeds Philharmonic and Subscription Concerts are shown in the last two programmes of the season. On March 22 the Joachim Quartet took the chief part in a concert of chamber music, playing Beethoven's so-called "Posthumous" Quartet in C sharp minor, while with Miss Fanny Davies they were heard in Schumann's Pianoforte Quartet. At the last concert of the season, on the 12th ult., Verdi's "Stabat Mater" was repeated, and, as a result of familiarity, was sung almost perfectly, and may be reckoned among the highest achievements of the Philharmonic chorus. They were less happy in the colossal "Triumphlied" of Brahms, for the simple reason that they obviously were but slightly acquainted with the music; but sang the "Ruins of Athens" and Parry's "Glories of our Blood and State" much better. Professor Stanford being in Breslau, superintending the production of "Shamus O'Brien," Sir Hubert Parry conducted, and introduced to Yorkshire his fine Symphonic Variations for orchestra. Madame Duma and Mr. Andrew Black were the vocalists. On March 24 the Leeds Symphony Society, an amateur organisation, gave a concert, the programme including Mozart's G minor Symphony and Mr. German's "Romeo and Juliet" suite. The choice was somewhat ambitious, considering the capacities of the orchestra, and they were handicapped by the absence, through illness, of their conductor, Mr. Grimshaw, whose duties were shared at short notice by Mr. Müller and Mr. E. Elliott. On March 27 the annual Holy Week performance of the "St. Matthew" Passion was given at the Leeds Parish Church. This time there was neither orchestra nor conductor, but the excellent training of the augmented choir, now thoroughly familiar with the work, was shown in a really finished performance. Mr. Benton was at the organ. On the 18th ult. the Leeds Orchestra, under Mr. Edward Elliott's conductorship, gave an enjoyable concert. Miss Gertrude Wortley played Weber's Concertstück in a thoroughly artistic and indeed brilliant style, and German's "Romeo and Juliet" suite, played sympathetically, was another important feature of the programme. On March 28 Mr. Willibald Richter, a pianist of very exceptional attainments, gave a recital, playing Bach's Chromatic Fantasia, a Beethoven Sonata, Schumann's Carnival, and some Chopin pieces with remarkable brilliancy and artistic insight.

The Bradford Festival Choral Society gave a concert on March 24 that did justice to its own abilities, and even more to those of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra, which was associated with it. Under Mr. Cowen's clear and inspiring beat they attempted, with a remarkable degree of success, a Wagner programme, including representative selections from nearly all Wagner's acknowledged works, from "Rienzi" to "Parsifal." The Grail scene from the latter work and the "Siegfried Idyll" were perhaps the happiest efforts, and were given with admirable finish and expression. Mr. Andrew Black was the vocalist. In connection with the re-opening of the Bradford Parish Church, the "Hymn of Praise" was given on the 13th ult. Here again some thirty members of the Permanent Orchestra co-operated, thus demonstrating once more their importance as a factor in the musical life of the district. They certainly well deserve the municipal support for which they have been asking, though in so commercial a community it is to be feared that their inability to "pay their way" may be regarded as a proof of artistic shortcomings.

The Huddersfield Subscription Concerts were brought to a close on March 28 with a demonstration of local powers in the shape of a "Huddersfield Night." The Glee and Madrigal Society supplied a chorus and the Philharmonic an orchestra, both under Mr. Ibeson's conductorship. Mrs. Haley took the solo part in Beethoven's Choral Fantasia, and Miss Effie Thomas and Mr. Riley were very successful in vocal solos. On the following night a fairly creditable rendering of the "St. Matthew" Passion was given at the Parish Church, with the somewhat doubtful help of a band of strings. Mr. Parratt's organ playing was a noteworthy feature of the performance.

Handel's "Samson" was the subject of the Keighley Musical Union's concert, on March 21. Mr. Benton conducted a good all-round performance; the soloists being Miss Agnes Nicholls (who has rapidly established herself in the West Riding as an oratorio soprano), Mrs. Ashcroft-Clarke, Messrs. Lawley and David Hughes. The amalgamated Harrogate Societies, now under Mr. C. L. Naylor's conductorship, gave Bennett's "May Queen," on March 14, with Miss H. D. Bishop, Messrs. Blagbro and Billington as soloists. The Ilkley Orchestral Society, of which Mr. Staniland Hall is conductor, gave its second concert on the 13th ult., music of a light but artistic character forming the programme; while a notable feature of the concert was the artistic violin playing of Mr. J. K. Empsall.

The York Musical Society ended its season on March 21 with Schubert's Mass in E flat and Dr. Alan Gray's "Rock Buoy Bell," which were sung creditably, though a more intimate knowledge of the music would not have been out of place in the case of the chorus. Canon Hudson conducted the Mass and Dr. Gray his own work, while the soloists were Mrs. Telford, Miss Ditchburn, Messrs. Monaghan, Wilkinson, and Metcalfe. On the 5th ult. a very interesting venture was started in the shape of the York Symphony Orchestra, which has been founded by Mr. T. Tertius Noble, the very able and enthusiastic organist of the Cathedral. A Haydn Symphony, Mr. Noble's very pleasant "Wasps" Overture, and Mr. Elgar's fine Serenade for strings were played in a way that showed what a competent and painstaking conductor can make of not very promising materials by thorough preparation. The general result was certainly far better than might have been expected from the individual abilities of the players, the large majority of whom were amateurs. At Scarborough, on the 3rd ult., Haydn's "Creation" (Parts I. and II.) and Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" were given by the Scarborough Choral Union, helped by a contingent from the Leeds Philharmonic Society. Mr. Pitcher conducted, and Madame Goodall, Miss Watson, Messrs. Brearley and W. Thornton were the principals.

The Hull Vocal Society gave Handel's "Samson" on the 18th ult. Dr. G. H. Smith, who had been preparing his audience by means of a series of lectures on the oratorio, took pains to give it, so far as possible, in its original guise. The chorus showed a very marked improvement and sang well throughout. The principals were Miss Helen Jaxon, Mrs. Kate Lee, Mr. Gregory Hast, and Mr. Arthur Barlow, of whom the first and last especially distinguished themselves.

On the 12th ult. the Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett, an amateur to whom the North of Yorkshire owes much, conducted a concert at Bedale, the programme including a Mendelssohn Psalm and some interesting instrumental solos. The Pontefract Choral and Orchestral Society's performance of "Elijah," on the 11th ult., deserves notice as marking an exceptional degree of completeness for the district. Pains had been taken to strengthen the orchestra by outside help, and Madame Sadler-Fogg, Madame Bertenshaw, Messrs. Child and Knowles proved thoroughly competent principals. Mr. R. B. Walker conducted. Gade's "Psyche" was chosen by the Pocklington Choral and Orchestral Society for its concert on the 12th ult., and was very creditably performed, under the Rev. W. E. Booty's conductorship. The principals were Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Crae, Mr. Blagbro, and Mr. Browning.

Among other choral concerts that deserve mention are those at Horton, where Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" was given on March 29, and Driffield, where, on the 11th ult., Dr. Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" was performed.

The excellent series of twenty-five Sunday popular concerts given at South Place, Finsbury, during the past season, were brought to a close on March 25. This, the 307th concert, and last of the thirteenth season, was specially devoted to British chamber music. The programme on this occasion included Stanford's String Quartet in D minor (Op. 64); the Andante from Mackenzie's Violin Concerto (Op. 32); the three charming sketches for the pianoforte, "The Lake, the Millstream, and the Fountain," by Sterndale Bennett (whose music is far too much neglected); Parry's Pianoforte Trio in E minor; and songs by Goring Thomas, R. H. Walthew, and E. Josephine Troup. The instrumental performers were Messrs. Richard H. Walthew, John Saunders, Archibald Evans, Ernest Yonge, William C. Hann, and J. Preuveneers; and Miss Ethel Bevans and Mr. Franklin Clive were the vocalists.

The Victoria Madrigal Society, at its concert in St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 13th ult., introduced a novelty by its painstaking conductor, Dr. G. Stanley Murray. Under the title of "Autumn Leaves" it deals reflectively with the brevity of life and its pleasures. Its five distinctive sections include parts for a quartet of soloists as well as for chorus. The best numbers are "Le Regret" and "l'Apostrophe," employing the full force of executants. In these Dr. Murray displays perception of effect combined with skill in part-writing. The work received justice from Miss Clara Addison, Miss Jessie King, Mr. James Leyland, and Mr. A. H. Gee as the soloists, and from the choir. The latter also sang with sustained vigour Morley's "Sing we and chaunt it" and Wilbye's "Stay, Corydon."

No novelties were included in Messrs. Walenn's third chamber concert on the 18th ult., at St. James's Hall, but it is worthy of record owing to their giving a second performance, and an excellent one, of M. Rachmaninov's finely conceived "Trio Elegiaque" in D (Op. 9) for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello. The work was criticised in The Musical Times for April, 1898, at page 248, and repeated hearing confirms the opinion then expressed. The evening of the 18th ult. will also be memorable to those who were present for a magnificent interpretation, by Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. Arthur Walenn, of Madame Liza Lehmann's masterly song-cycle "In a Persian Garden," undoubtedly the finest composition which has come from a lady's pen.

A performance of a new cantata by Thomas Facer, produced under the auspices of the Free Church Council, took place on the 18th ult., at Westbourne Park Chapel. The chorus consisted of the united choirs of the Paddington Free Churches, and the Western division of the London Sunday School Choir Orchestra played the accompaniments, as well as an overture and march conducted by Mr. David M. Davies. The cantata was conducted by Mrs. Mary Layton. The principal soloists were Mrs. Hettie Whyte, Miss Esther Franklin, Mr. E. F. Humphry, Mr. J. Stewart, and Mr. Alfred J. Layton. Some explanatory and historical remarks were given by the Rev. Dr. Clifford in the interval. Mr. F. Crewe Riechelmann presided at the organ.

The prospectus of the Melbourne Philharmonic Society for the present year announces that it is intended to perform the following important works:—"Israel in Egypt," in July; "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" (Coleridge-Taylor), Beethoven's "Ruins of Athens," and MacCunn's "Lay of the Last Minstrel," in October or November; "The Messiah" on Christmas Day, and possibly Sir Hubert Parry's "Judith," at an emergency concert. These, with Gounod's "Mors et Vita," given on Good Friday, indicate the excellent work that is being undertaken by this Society, now in its forty-sixth year.

At St. Paul's Cathedral the customary Holy Week performance (March 28) of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion music was as imposing as ever. The devotional character of the work was recognised by the vast congregation joining in the chorales to a greater extent than previously observed. The solo passages were entrusted to members of the Cathedral choir, those for soprano and alto being given by the whole of the boys, who kept well together. For other portions of the work the choir was largely augmented, and the entire composition was sung as smoothly as could be desired. Sir George Martin conducted and Mr. Charles Macpherson was at the organ.

The Denmark Hill Musical Society gave a private invitation concert on the 13th ult., at which Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was performed, which thus concluded a very successful season. The solos were rendered by Miss Beatrice Holliday, Miss Louie Carrington, Mr. J. S. Holliday, and Mr. H. J. Corner. Mr. L. Szczepanowski was the principal first violin and Mr. Howard Leask and Miss Nellie Hancock presided at the organ and pianoforte respectively. Dr. Warriner conducted. It may be of interest to state that this flourishing Society gives no public concerts, all admissions being by invitation, whilst its entire income is derived from private sources.

The Nonconformist Choir Union Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. T. R. Croger, gave an attractive concert at the People's Palace, on the 8th ult. The programme included Edward German's Bourée and Gigue, from the "Much Ado about Nothing" music; Coleridge-Taylor's Characteristic Waltzes; a movement from Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony; Minuet and Finale from Haydn's Symphony in D; the Andante and Allegro molto from Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor for pianoforte and orchestra, the solo part being admirably performed by Miss Beatrice Cowley; Gounod's Overture to "Mirelle," and Arthur Berridge's "St. Alban's Festal March."

The musical evenings of the Curtius Club were resumed on the 12th ult., at the Princes' Galleries. The concert on this occasion was given by Madame Haas and Mr. Theodore Werner, whose most important performance was that of César Franck's seldom heard Sonata in A for pianoforte and violin, one of the best works of this composer. Madame Minna Fisher was the vocalist. The concert on the 19th ult. was undertaken by Mrs. Gordon-Woodhouse and Señor Rubio, who played Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 69) for pianoforte and violoncello. The vocalists were Madame Bertha Moore and Mr. Ley Vernon.

The Westbourne Park Choral Association gave its final concert for the season on March 28, under the direction of Mrs. Mary Layton. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen," the Choral March from "Tannhäuser," two part-songs by Eaton Faning, "Daybreak" and "The Miller's Wooing," and "The Snow," by Edward Elgar, a beautiful composition for ladies' voices, two violins, and pianoforte. The principal soloists were Mrs. Hettie Whyte, Miss Edith Kingsford, Miss Esther Franklin, Mr. Albon Nash, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Violin, Mr. George Wilby.

The Gravesend and Milton Choral Association has just attained its majority, and several artists who have visited Gravesend have expressed their desire to recognise in an agreeable and suitable manner the valuable services rendered by the honorary secretary, Mr. R. Feaver Clarke, during the past twenty-one years. A pleasing and probably unique feature in connection with this Society is that the conductor, Mr. Charles R. Green; the accompanist, Mr. Howard Moss; and Mr. R. Feaver Clarke have each held their respective offices in unbroken continuity throughout the twenty-one years.

A course of lectures on "Der Ring des Nibelungen" was commenced on the 18th ult., at Steinway Hall, by Mr. J. C. Ashton Jonson. As a preparation for the Bayreuth performance the general plan of the "Ring" was described, and then the leading points of "Das Rheingold" were clearly set forth. The numerous musical illustrations were played in a masterly manner by Mr. Edwin H. Lemare.

Mr. Fountain Meen gave a most successful concert at the Northern Polytechnic Institution, on the 18th ult., the hall being crowded. The artists were Madame Clara Samuell, Mrs. Betjemann, Mr. Ernest Hodgson, Mr. Santley, Mr. G. H. Betjemann, Miss Greta Garnier, and the Meister Glee Singers. Mr. Fountain Meen gave as organ solos, "Choral Song and Fugue," by S. S. Wesley, and "Scherzo," by W. S. Hoyte; he also played, with Mr. G. H. Betjemann, Grieg's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin, besides acting as accompanist.

Mr. Percy Sherwood, an Englishman residing at Dresden, has been awarded the prize of 500 marks, offered by the committee of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, for a string quartet, and another of 300 marks has been adjudged in favour of Herr Hermann Bischoff, of Munich, for a choral composition. Both the successful works will be performed in the course of the annual meeting of the Verein, on the 10th to the 13th inst., at Dortmund, for which occasion an interesting programme has been prepared.

At Cross Street Baptist Church, Islington, a performance of T. Mee Pattison's "Miracles of Christ" and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" was given, on the 18th ult. The solos were rendered very effectively by Miss Adeline Boff, Miss Mary Large, Mr. T. B. Thomson, and Mr. R. Cobring. The choir and orchestra, numbering over sixty performers, rendered excellent service under the conductor, Mr. Harold S. Smets (organist and choirmaster of the church), and Mr. T. Mee Pattison ably presided at the organ.

To lovers of Schumann an interesting occasion should be the recital, by Mr. Charles Fry, of Byron's dramatic poem "Manfred," with Schumann's music, on June 21, at St. George's Hall. This will be given for the first time in London in its complete form, the poem being necessarily abridged for concert use. The music will be performed by the full orchestra and chorus of the London Organ School (augmented to about 100 performers), under the direction of Dr. Yorke Trotter.

On Good Friday night a performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was given at the Court Hill Schools, Lewisham, by the Lewisham Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. Frank Idle. The soloists were Madame Kate Bernberg, Miss Muriel Heath, Miss Annie Brazil, Mr. Ben Grove, and Mr. John Gritton. At the organ was Mr. Henry Tolhurst, and at the pianoforte, Mr. Henry R. A. Robinson.

The Highgate Philharmonic Society gave a very excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," on the 12th ult., in the Stanley Hall, Junction Road. Miss Teresa Blamy, Miss Beatrice May, Mr. Maurice Aubrey, and Mr. H. Lane Wilson (who deserves special mention for his expressive singing in the part of St. Paul) rendered the solos, and Mr. William A. Gardner was an efficient conductor.

Miss Norah Nicolas gave a concert on the 12th ult., at the Steinway Hall, and proved herself a violinist of great ability and promise. Her interpretations of Saint-Saëns's "Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso," Svendsen's "Romance," and Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" were admirable. She was assisted by Mr. C. A. Lidgey, Mr. Ludwig Lebell, and Mr. Frederick Keel.

Miss Winifred Williams gave her annual concert at Gresham Hall, Brixton, on the 19th ult., assisted by Miss Gertrude Hughes, Miss Alice Williams, Miss Ethel Williams, Mr. Thomas Thomas, and Mr. Jerome Murphy (vocalists), Miss Nadia Sylva (violin), Mr. Cyril Clensy (violoncello), and Mrs. Alicia Adelaide Needham and Mr. George Minson (accompanists).

Gounod's "Redemption" was performed by the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, at the Crystal Palace, on March 25. The solos were ably rendered by Miss Edith Hensler, Miss Jessie King, Miss Florence Ogilvie, Mr. Albon Nash, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Mr. J. W. Lewis was the painstaking conductor, and Mr. Fountain Meen presided with his usual ability at the organ.

The third annual central competition of district prize choirs, organised by the Sunday School Union, was held in Bishopsgate Chapel, on the 11th ult. Nine choirs competed. The singing was much above the average of Sunday School choir singing. Onslow School, Brompton, gained the first prize, Hanover School, Peckham, coming next, and Holly Park, Crouch Hill, third.

Messrs. Joseph Perceval and A. C. Praeger gave their second annual evening concert at the Central Hall, Acton, on the 12th ult. The soloists were Miss Kingsford, Miss Edith Broad, Miss Minnie Chamberlain, Mr. Horace Lott, Mr. Joseph Perceval, Mr. B. Paterson Parker (violoncellist), and Mr. Walter George. Messrs. A. C. Praeger and H. J. Evans accompanied.

The annual performance of "The Messiah" at Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road, was given, as usual, on Good Friday evening, and attracted a large audience The soloists were Madame Ada Patterson, Madame Rose Dafforne, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Harry Dearth. Dr. F. N. Abernethy presided at the organ, and Mr. J. R. Griffiths conducted.

Signor G. Aldo Randegger gave a pianoforte recital on March 27, at the Steinway Hall, and proved himself to be an executant possessing artistic taste and ability. His reading of Beethoven's Sonata in E flat (Op. 27, No. 1) was somewhat effeminate, but his interpretation of a Chopin selection was distinguished by poetic and romantic expression.

At St. Mary's Church, Hornsey, the usual performance of Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given on Good Friday, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Baker, organist of the church. The choir consisted of seventy voices, and the solos were sung by Mr. Wright Beaumont and Mr. Edwin Webster, the latter vocalist's singing being specially excellent.

At the Easter Vestry of Christ Church, Lee Park, a presentation of a cheque for fifty guineas, together with an illuminated address, with the names of the subscribers enclosed in an album, was made to Mr. J. T. Field, as a mark of esteem and appreciation of his long and faithful services as organist and director of the choir of the church.

On March 29, at St. John's, Hoxton, before a large congregation, the church choir (augmented), with the assistance of the Mildmay Park Orchestral Society, gave a successful performance of Mr. C. Lee Williams's cantata "The Last Night at Bethany." Mr. F. Bowen conducted.

Gounod's "Redemption" was given in St. Paul's Church, Beckenham, on March 28. Mr. Newcombe conducted and Mr. G. J. Hall presided at the organ. The solos were taken by Miss Green, Mrs. Boulcott Newth, Messrs. Henry Clements and A. W. Henley.

Messrs. Puttick and Simpson's next half-yearly sale of valuable violins, &c., will take place on the 16th inst. Amateurs and others possessing examples of the rarer makers, and being desirous of disposing of same, are invited to communicate with the auctioneers.

Mr. C. H. Kitson, who has been assistant to Mr. Arthur Somervell at Haileybury College for nearly two years, has been appointed organist and music master at St. Edmund's School, Canterbury.

A brass band contest (open to all amateur bands) will be held at the New Brighton Tower and Pleasure Gardens, on Saturday, August 5, when prizes to the value of £132 will be offered for competition.

Dr. A. Madeley Richardson has accepted the appointment of musical director of the Passmore Edwards Settlement, in succession to Mr. Charles Williams.

The death took place on Easter Day, at Lindenhof, Coswig, Saxony, in her eighty-ninth year, of Caroline, widow of Henry Hugh Pierson, the composer.

Sir Henry Tate, Bart., has presented a large three-manual organ, to be constructed by Messrs. Beale and Thynne, to the Battersea Polytechnic.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Berlin.—Lortzing's posthumous opera, "Regina," the libretto of which had been revised by Herr L'Arronge, was produced for the first time at the Royal Opera on March 21, and although the music appeared to be passé, the work, on the whole, proved very effective and was most favourably received.——Highly satisfactory results were exhibited at a series of public concerts recently given by the pupils of the Klindworth-Scharwenka Conservatorium, amongst the works produced by the members of the choral and instrumental classes being the second part of Perosi's "La Passione di Christo."

Bremen.—A new opera, "Frau Holle" (the legendary personage to whom allusion is made in the ballad sung by the shepherd lad in "Tannhäuser"), was brought out successfully at the Stadt-Theater last month. Herr Georg Kunoth is the author of both music and libretto.

Breslau.—The well-known Bohn'sche Gesangverein gave two interesting concerts, last month, devoted entirely to vocal compositions by Haydn, the first consisting of sacred works only and the second including the cantata "Ariadne auf Naxos," as well as excerpts from the operas "La vera Costanza," "Philémon et Baucis," "L'Incontro improviso," and "Orlando Paladino."

Budapest.—The last Philharmonic concert of the season, on March 27, included a magnificent performance of Beethoven's Ninth Symphony, under Dr. Hans Richter, in which the choir of the Verein der Musikfreunde took part, the concert opening with Erkel's Overture to the opera "Bathori Maria," conducted by the composer's son, Alexander.

Cassel.—A competition of male choirs, on a large scale, is to be held here, from the 25th to the 28th inst., under the special patronage of the Emperor William, and for which some valuable prizes have been offered. An old opera by Spohr, "Die Kreuzfahrer," the score of which has recently been discovered in the archives of the Royal Theatre, will be revived on this occasion. The composer, it may be added, for many years occupied the post of first Capellmeister at the Cassel Theatre.

Constantinople.—At the instigation of an enthusiastic admirer of the Bayreuth master, M. Cotard, a performance of important excerpts from "Parsifal" was given, on March 20, at the Græco-French Institute, by a number of resident musicians and amateurs, under the direction of Herr Paul Lange. The performance was preceded by an explanatory lecture, delivered by the director of the Institute, Herr Hantz, which produced a very marked impression.

Dresden.—The twenty-fifth anniversary of the first performance of Edmund Kretzschmer's successful opera "Die Folkunger" was signalised, on March 23, by a special performance of the work at the Royal Theatre. Fräulein Therese Malten, the original interpreter of the principal female rôle, again sang the part on the present occasion, though she has now practically retired from the operatic stage.

Elberfeld.—The opera "Lovelace," by M. Henri Hirschmann, first produced last year in Paris, met with a very good reception at its production, on the 3rd ult., at the Stadt-Theater, under Capellmeister Hertz's direction.

Frankfort-on-Main.—The first performance took place, on March 20, of a new "Passion" oratorio, by Felix Woyrsch, under the direction of Professor Bernhard Scholz, with the co-operation of a select choir, and Mesdames Uzielli and Nievelt, Herren Sistermans and Burgstaller, in the solo parts. The work, which has been most highly spoken of in the leading press organs, produced a profound impression upon a very numerous audience.

Helsingfors.—Professor Xaver Scharwenka met with a most enthusiastic reception in two concerts given by him last month, when the eminent pianist-composer introduced, for the first time here, his Pianoforte Concertos in B flat and C sharp minor, besides playing a number of pieces from the classical repertory. The artist also conducted his C minor Symphony, at one of the Philharmonic concerts, with considerable success.

Leipzig.—The sum of one thousand marks has been voted from the Weimar Liszt Fund to the well-known

Riedel Choral Society towards a performance, at St. Thomas's Church, of Liszt's seldom-heard oratorio "Christus." —— Berlioz's "Phantastic" Symphony ("Episode de la vie d'un artiste") was performed, for the first time, at one of the recent Gewandhaus concerts, under Herr Nikisch's direction, but failed to appeal to the taste of the great majority of the audience.

Milan.—An attempt recently made at the Teatro Lirico to revive "Le Nozze di Figaro" failed completely, on account, partly, of the inadequate training of the singers for the interpretation of Mozart's music, and partly because of the indifference of the audience. The work had not been given in Milan since the year 1825, when it was eclipsed in popular favour by Rossini's "Il Barbiere."

Monaco.—Father Marciano Perosi, a brother of Don Lorenzo, is the composer of a symphonic work entitled "Farewell to the expiring century," which will shortly be performed here. The composer is a professor of music at the College of the Visitation.

Monte Carlo.—Mr. Isidore de Lara's new opera, "Messaline," the libretto by MM. Armand Silvestre and Eugène Morand, was produced for the first time on March 20 and well received by a very numerous audience.

Paris.—M. Paul Puget's new opera, "Beaucoup de bruit pour rien," the libretto from the pen of M. Edouard Blau, and founded, of course, on Shakespeare's comedy "Much Ado about Nothing," was brought out at the Opéra Comique on March 24, with great success.——An excellent revival of Weber's "Oberon" took place, last month, at the Théâtre Lyrique, the noble work—almost unknown to the present generation of opera-goers—proving most highly attractive. It is, therefore, likely to remain in the repertory for some time.

Pesaro.—Mascagni is just now engaged, for the first time, on the composition of a ballet, entitled "I Marionnetti," the scenario having been furnished by Signor Roberto Bracco.

Prague.—Goldmark's new opera, "Die Kriegsgefangene," was produced at the German Theatre, on March 23, in the presence of the composer, and achieved a brilliant success. The performance, under the direction of Capellmeister Markus, was excellent.——On the 8th ult. the first performance took place, at the same theatre, of Hugo Wolf's four-act comic opera "Der Corregidor," with very considerable success, this being the first important theatre at which the only operatic production of the gifted song writer has so far been produced.

Rohrau.—A committee has been formed at Vienna for the purpose of collecting the necessary funds for the reconstruction, as near as possible in conformity with the original, of the house where Haydn was born, and which was recently destroyed by a conflagration.

Rome.—The season of opera at the Costanzi Theatre was opened, on the 2nd ult., with Puccini's "La Bohème," and amongst novelties to be shortly brought out are Mascagni's "Iris" and a new work by the Maëstro Floridia, entitled "Colonia Libera."

Stockholm.—A new opera by the Swedish composer, A. Hallén, entitled "Waldemar's Treasure," the subject being taken from early Scandinavian history, was brought out at the Royal Opera, on the 8th ult., and received with great favour.

Stuttgart.—A new opera, "The Feast of Solhang," the libretto founded on Ibsen's drama, by the young Swedish composer, J. Stenhammer, was brought out at the Royal Theatre, on the 12th ult., with great success.

Turin.—The first performance took place, on the 2nd ult., at the Church of the Sacred Heart, of a new mass, "Benedicamus Domine," by Perosi, which had obtained a prize at the recent Exhibition of Sacred Art. The rendering by the Schola Cantorum, under the Maëstro Dogliani's direction, was an excellent one; but there was no manifestation of enthusiasm on the part of the enormous audience assembled.

Vienna.—Siegfried Wagner's comic opera "Der Bärenhäuter" was produced at the Imperial Opera, on March 26, under Herr Mahler's direction, and received with great favour, quite an ovation being offered to the son of the Bayreuth master by the warm-hearted Viennese audience at the conclusion of the performance.——The first Viennese performance of Herr Mahler's Second Symphony for soli, chorus, orchestra, and organ was given on the 9th ult., the work being constructed somewhat on the lines of Beethoven's Choral Symphony. The performance was an excellent one, under the composer's direction, and produced a most marked impression.——On March 25 the annual concert of the Schubert-Bund took place, the principal number in the programme being Anton Bruckner's massive choral work "Helgoland," the concert concluding with a very fine interpretation of Schubert's "Allmacht."——The performance, on the 8th ult., by a company of Italian artists, and under the composer's direction, of Perosi's oratorio "The Resurrection of Christ," was a complete success as far as the reception of the work by the public was concerned, while the opinions of the leading press organs are somewhat guardedly expressed.——Dr. Richter has, it is now definitely stated, renewed his contract as conductor of the Imperial Opera till the year 1904, with a largely increased salary, the absolute choice of the operas to be conducted by him, and an unlimited leave of absence to fulfil his various foreign engagements.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ashford (Kent).—The united forces of the Choral and Orchestral Societies gave one of their best concerts on the 6th ult. The works performed were Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" and Barnett's "Ancient Mariner." The solos were sung by Miss Amy Sargent, Mrs. E. Colville, Miss Ethel Chapman, Mr. Wilfrid Kearton, and Mr. George Lauder, all of whom did ample justice to the music entrusted to them. The choruses were excellently sung and the band rendered admirable service. Dr. Wilks conducted with his usual ability.

Biggleswade.—The Biggleswade Choral Society performed Handel's "Saul," on the 13th ult., in the Town Hall, with a band and chorus of 100, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. G. Cooper. The soloists were Miss Annie Bartle, Miss Florence Croft, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. George Stubbs. In a short miscellaneous part following "Saul," there was included an "Intermezzo" for strings, entitled "An idle moment," composed by Mr. Cooper, and which was well received.

Blackpool.—At the Winter Gardens, on Good Friday, Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" was given in a very praiseworthy manner by the Blackpool Choral Society. The soloists were Miss F. de Boufleurs, Miss Alice Bertenshaw, Mr. Austen Mahoney, and Mr. Stanley Cookson, all of whom gave great satisfaction. Mr. H. Whiteaker was the conductor.

Blindley Heath.—On the 5th ult. the Choral Society gave a satisfactory rendering of Barnett's "The Ancient Mariner" in the Blindley Heath Hall. Mr. W. E. Bartlett was the efficient conductor, and Miss Hazeldine accompanied. Mrs. Broughton, Mrs. Williams, Dr. Fenn, and Mr. Frank Betterson sang the solos with great acceptance.

Bootle.—The very interesting closing lecture of the twelfth season, given in connection with the Borough of Bootle Free Public Library and Museum, was delivered by Mr. A. E. Workman, in the Town Hall, on March 28, the subject being "The Life and Works of Handel." It was largely attended, and the illustrations were ably rendered by Miss Salmond, Misses M. Wild and E. Buchanan, Messrs. T. Morgan, W. K. Poulsom, Robert Wilson, W. McBryde, J. W. Collinson, and A. E. Workman.

Briton Ferry.—On the 13th ult. the choir of Bethel Chapel gave a successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," when they rendered several of the choruses with excellent effect. The soloists were Miss Dina Saul, Miss Bessie Evans, Mr. Gwilym Richards, and Mr. David Hughes. Hulley's band provided the orchestral accompaniments, whilst Miss Jessie Davies presided at the pianoforte. Mr. Gwilym Richards conducted.

Cambuslang.—At a concert given in the Institute Hall, on March 21, the Cambuslang Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Haydn's "Creation," before a crowded audience. Miss Agnes Thomas, Mr. C. J. Rhodes, and Mr. Walter Harvey contributed the solos with much acceptance. Mr. Alex. Stevenson presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. H. Walton conducted.

Canterbury.—At the Cathedral, on Good Friday evening, Stainer's "Crucifixion" was well rendered by a large chorus, with Messrs. Pearson and Higgins, two of the lay-clerks, as soloists. On Easter Thursday evening a still greater success was achieved by an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the instrumental portion being entrusted to an orchestra composed of strings, brass, drums, and organ, led by Mr. Cecil Gaun. Mr. Halward (one of the lay-clerks) sang the tenor solo, while the soprano solo work was divided amongst three of the Cathedral choristers. Both works were ably conducted by the Cathedral organist, Mr. H. C. Perrin.

Cheltenham.—On the 6th ult. the Cheltenham Musical Festival Society gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Assembly Rooms. The solos were artistically rendered by Madame Medora Henson, Miss Susan Harrhy, Miss Ada Crossley, Mr. Gwilym Richards, Mr. C. Eynon Morgan, Mr. Fred. Lightowler, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. Mr. J. A. Matthews conducted with his accustomed skill.

Chesterfield.—The Chesterfield Orchestral Society gave its sixth annual concert, in the Stephenson Memorial Hall, on the 11th ult. Elgar's "Serenade" for strings only, Mendelssohn's "Scotch" Symphony, and German's "Gipsy Suite" were the chief pieces performed. Mr. H. N. Biggin was the able conductor.

Clydebank.—The Clydebank and District Choral Union gave a harmonious and sympathetic rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Burgh Hall, on the 11th ult., under the skilful conductorship of Mr. W. J. Clapperton. The soloists were Miss Jenny Taggart, Miss M. W. Fyffe, Mr. Thomas Menzies, and Mr. Charles Tree, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit.

Cork.—The first production of any of Perosi's works in the United Kingdom took place in the capital of South Ireland, in the performance of his "Missa Pontificalis" by the choir of SS. Peter and Paul's Catholic Church (renowned for its excellent musical services), under the direction of Herr Theo Gmür, on Easter Sunday last. The local papers are full of praise, both in regard to the work itself and as to the admirable way in which it was performed.

Cornforth.—A performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" was given by the Cornforth and District Choral Society, at the Board Schools, West Cornforth, on the 17th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss M. Wilson, Miss A. Stainer, Mr. W. Macdonald, and Mr. J. Duncannon, all of whom gave a satisfactory account of their music, the ladies making a special success in the duet "O lovely peace." The choir consisted of about seventy voices, and its successful efforts indicated the result of the careful training received from Mr. Dennay. The orchestral accompaniments were played by the band of Durham County Asylum, with the assistance of Messrs. W. Parker and J. Mason at the pianoforte and harmonium; the whole performance being ably directed by Mr. J. G. Robinson, conductor of the Society.

Coventry.—The choir of West Orchard Chapel, under the conductorship of Mr. John Potter, the organist, gave a very successful sacred concert on Good Friday, when Sir Frederick Bridge's "Cradle of Christ," Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and Tschaïkowsky's "Elegie" were performed. The solos were artistically rendered by Miss Nina Poole and Mr. H. E. Smart; and Mr. Parkes presided at the organ.——On the 11th ult. the Coventry Musical Society gave a performance of Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast," which has, in so short a space of time, attained so much fame and so well-merited a success. With a band and chorus of over 200, under Mr. Walter Hoyle, the honorary conductor, the work was attacked with vigour and precision and performed with credit to all concerned. The solo, "Onaway! awake, beloved!" was sung with admirable effect by Mr. Herbert Grover, who was cordially applauded.

Crickhowell.—The Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm in the Clarence Hall, on the 5th ult. Mr. George Robertson Sinclair conducted, and the soloists were Masters Herbert Harden and Willie Gammage and Mr. Charles Saunders. The accompanist was the Hon. Mabel Bailey.

Darlaston.—The members of the Choral Society gave a successful performance of "St. Paul," on the 20th ult. The solos were excellently rendered by Miss Edith Farrow, Miss K. Harper, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. W. Evans. A noticeable feature was the excellent work of the members of the chorus, who sang with much enthusiasm. Mr. T. Johnson was conductor and Mr. F. Ward leader of the band.

Darlington.—The Darlington Orchestral Society gave its eighteenth annual concert on the 6th ult., in the New Drill Hall. The programme included Schubert's "Tragic" Symphony, Cowen's "English Dances," &c. The orchestra numbered between fifty and sixty performers, and the whole of the orchestral numbers were rendered with admirable precision. The vocalists were Miss Nellie Buckley and Mr. Brearley. Mr. J. Walton was the solo violoncellist, and all these artists acquitted themselves admirably. The honorary conductor of the Society, Mr. Fred. Tovey, conducted with his customary ability.

Devizes.—The Musical Association gave a satisfactory rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" in the Corn Exchange, on the 10th ult. Mr. H. H. Baker ably conducted, and the soloists were Miss Gertrude Woodall, Madame Hamlen Ruland, Mr. Frank Tebbutt, and Mr. Mansell Lewis. This is the first time Mendelssohn's fine work has been given in Devizes, and its performance reflected great credit upon all concerned.

Falmouth.—Mr. J. F. Barnett's popular cantata "The Ancient Mariner" was given by the Philharmonic Society, under the baton of Mr. F. G. Patey, on the 14th ult., with very considerable success. It is hardly possible to speak too highly of the way in which the chorus acquitted itself of its task. The performance was remarkable for vigour and decision no less than for delicacy and beauty of tone. The soloists were Miss Lilian Jane, Mrs. Krieger, a local amateur (in the place of Miss Palmer, absent through indisposition), Mr. J. C. Truscott, and Mr. G. S. Meadows, all of whom acquitted themselves with distinction. Much praise is due to Miss Treweeke for the admirable manner in which she led the orchestra.

Frome.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah" received a very satisfactory rendering in Wesley Chapel on Good Friday evening. The soloists were Misses Marianne Richards, Mary Wood, and Lily White; Messrs. E. T. Morgan, D. Harrison, and C. E. Poole, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit. Mr. R. G. White and Mr. S. Grant were the efficient organist and conductor respectively.

Galway.—A very successful performance of Part I. of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" was given on March 28, by the Galway Musical Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Williams. This Society is making rapid progress, and the excellent way in which the above work was performed speaks well for its efficiency and for its future success.

Gravesend.—The Gravesend and Milton Choral Association attained its majority on the 18th ult., and in commemoration thereof gave a very fine performance of Gounod's "Redemption." The solo vocalists engaged were Madame Bertha Rossow, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Edward Branscombe, Mr. Charles Copland, and Mr. H. Lane Wilson, who all acquitted themselves splendidly. The orchestra comprised members of the principal London orchestras, led by Mr. Charles Newton, Mr. Howard Moss presiding at the harmonium. The accompaniments were played with considerable skill and intelligence, the pianoforte parts being very delicately rendered. Too much praise cannot be given to the chorus, whose efforts reflected great credit upon the training of Mr. Charles R. Green, who conducted with marked ability.

Guernsey.—Two very successful concerts were given on March 21 and 22, by the Guille-Allès Choral and Orchestral Associations, at which Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Sir Frederick Bridge's "Flag of England" were performed. This was the first performance of the latter work in the Channel Islands, and it was very creditably rendered and most enthusiastically received. The solos were sung by Miss Kate Cherry, Madame Edith Hands, and Mr. Vivian Bennetts, who all gave great satisfaction to large audiences. The orchestra was ably led by Mr. Richard Arscott. Mrs. John Gardner afforded invaluable assistance at the pianoforte and Mr. John David conducted throughout.

Hetton-le-hole.—A performance of Handel's "Samson" was given in the Primitive Methodist Church on Good Friday. The orchestra and choir numbered 120 performers. The soloists were Miss Maggie Wilson, Miss Amy Stanners, Mr. D. S. Macdonald, and Mr. J. Duncanson, all of whom did full justice to their respective parts. The choruses were admirably sung and the orchestra (under the leadership of Mr. W. Stranghan) acquitted itself in excellent style. Mr. John T. Dixon was an efficient organist and Mr. R. Young conducted in a manner that merited full praise.

Holbeach and Spalding.—Two successful performances of J. Allanson Benson's dramatic cantata "Bottreaux Bells" were recently given by the combined Spalding and Holbeach Choral Societies, together with orchestra, in the Public Hall, Holbeach, and the Corn Exchange, Spalding, on the 6th and 7th ult. respectively. The soloists were Miss Emilie Sheffield, Miss Adelaide Lambe, Mr. Ager Grover, and Mr. Alex. Musgrove. The second part of the programme included Eaton Faning's "Miller's Wooing," together with three new songs (given with orchestral accompaniment) by the conductor, Mr. S. Gatty Sellers.

Howden.—On the 11th ult. the Howden Shire Choral Society gave a very successful concluding concert of the season, in the Shire Hall, under the able conductorship of Mr. Fosbery. Cowen's "Rose Maiden" was given, and the solos were well sung by Madame Norledge, Miss Clara Brooke, Mr. Dunkerton, and Mr. W. H. Dawson. Miss Fitch and Mr. R. P. Jones presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively.

Kingston.—On the 12th ult., at the Town Hall, an excellent rendering of Cowen's "St. John's Eve" and Schubert's "Song of Miriam" was given by the Kingston Musical Society. The soloists were Miss Agnes Treacy, Mrs. Morris Goddard, Mr. Dan Jones, and Mr. John Horan, jun. The concert was under the capable direction of Mr. T. F. Marchant.

Lancaster.—On the 5th ult. the Lancaster Choral Society gave an interesting miscellaneous concert, the chief features of which were Stanford's "The Revenge," Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture, Gounod's Overture to "Mireille," three movements from Massenet's Suite, "Scènes Pittoresques," and the "Tannhäuser" March. Miss Katie van Noorden sang some songs in a pleasing manner and Mr. J. W. Aldous conducted with his customary ability.

Louth.—The Louth Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of "Spring," from Haydn's "Seasons," and also Cowen's "St. John's Eve," in the Town Hall, on the 6th ult. The solos were ably rendered by Madame Goodall, Miss Isa Frood, Mr. Charles Nicholson, and Mr. John Browning. Mr. Owen M. Price was the efficient conductor.

Middleton-in-Teesdale.—On the 14th ult. a very successful concert was given by the Choral Society, in the Lead Company's Schoolroom, Mr. T. E. Robinson conducting. Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day" was given, Miss Amie St. John singing the solos in a very praiseworthy manner. The accompaniments were ably rendered by Mr. Oddie and Mr. T. Henderson.

Moffat (N.B.)—The Choral Union, under the conductorship of Mr. M. B. Kidd, gave its annual concert on March 23. The choral works consisted of Coleridge-Taylor's cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" (being its second performance in Scotland), Gounod's "Gallia," and Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer." The soloists were Miss Gordon Pillans (soprano), Miss Sybil C. Tireman (violinist), Mr. J. A. T. Stronach (tenor), and Colonel Younger (baritone). Miss Nevay was the accompanist.

Newbury.—The Choral Society added another leaf to its laurels by its performance of Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon," on the 19th ult., at the Town Hall. The attempt was an ambitious one, but it was fully justified by the result. The choir sang admirably, especially in the chorus "God save the king," "Make a joyful noise," and "Sing, O heavens." A full orchestra was employed, under the leadership of Miss Dorothy Blunt; and for the excellence of the performance, as a whole, Mr. J. S. Liddle, who conducted with skill and discretion, is to be congratulated. The solo vocalists were Miss Florence Cromey, Miss Anita Sutherland, Mr. Horace Lott, Mr. Giffard Wells, and Mr. J. Percival.

New Malden.—Mr. Reginald Hellyar's Choral Society gave its second concert in the Institute Hall, on the 11th ult., in aid of the funds of the New Malden and Coombe Victoria Nursing Institute. The programme included Gaul's sacred cantata "The Holy City," the solos being taken by Miss Maud Allen, Miss Patti Campion, Mr. Edward Iles, and Mr. Samuel Masters. The chorus sang with much precision and testified to the excellence of its training by the conductor, Mr. Hellyar.

New Westminster (British Columbia).—The New Westminster Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of Haydn's "Creation" in the Opera House, on March 21, under the able conductorship of Mr. A. E. White. The solos were successfully rendered by Mrs. Boyce, Miss Walton, Messrs. J. B. Rushton, J. F. Colliston, Godfrey W. Booth, and M. Y. Knight, jun.

Paignton.—Mr. S. H. Martin's Choral Class gave a performance of "Elijah," on the 19th ult., in Christ Church. Mr. Norman Kendall sang the part of the Prophet, and the other solo vocalists were Miss Tresilian Davy, Miss Gertrude Hicks, and Mr. Albert Collings. The chorus sang, on the whole, excellently, and a small orchestra was employed, assisted by Dr. Wood (of Exeter Cathedral) at the organ. Mr. Martin conducted with ability.

Peebles.—On the 5th ult. the Peebles Choral Society gave its annual concert in the Chambers Institute Hall, under the able leadership of Mr. James J. Finlay. Parry's oratorio "Job" was performed with great credit, and the solos were well sustained by Miss Rough, Mr. Glencorse, and Mr. Moncur.

Pontypridd.—A most successful concert was given, on the 3rd ult., in the new Town Hall, the artists being Miss Llewela Davies (solo pianist), Miss Gwendolen Davies (solo violin), Miss Norah Rich (soprano), Mr. Frederic Griffith (solo flute and piccolo), and Mr. Harry Miller (baritone), all of whom were recalled for their excellent performances. The Hopkinstown Male-Voice Party also took part. Miss Llewela Davies and Mrs. John Lewis were the accompanists.

Portsmouth.—The Portsmouth Musical Association, under the direction of Mr. J. W. D. Pillow, gave its first concert in the Parish Institute, on the 11th ult., when Cowen's "St. John's Eve" was satisfactorily rendered. The solos were well sung by Miss Lillian Crosby, Miss Bessie Grant, Mr. Albert Pearce, and Mr. Griffith-Percy. Mr. W. F. Earle presided at the pianoforte.

Reading.—The choir of St. Giles's gave an excellent rendering of Mr. C. Lee Williams's sacred cantata "Bethany," on March 28, in the Parish Church. The work was produced under the direction of the organist of the church, Mr. P. R. Scrivener, who is to be congratulated upon the satisfactory results of his careful training of the choir. The soloist was Mr. C. M. Child, of Oxford Cathedral choir, who acquitted himself with success. The organ, at which Mr. W. Boggis efficiently presided, was supplemented by a small but efficient orchestra, of which Miss E. Radcliffe was the leader.—On the 11th ult. the Reading Philharmonic Society gave a very successful concert in the large Town Hall, under the experienced conductorship of Mr. W. H. Strickland. Mendelssohn's "Athalie" and Handel's "Acis and Galatea" were performed with great credit, the soloists being Madame Emily Squire, Misses Roche, Ethel Ravenscroft, and L. Brooksby, and Messrs. Gwillym Evans and Foxton Ferguson. Mr. D. Boseley accompanied on the organ.

Retford.—Mr. Hamilton White's Vocal and Instrumental Class gave an excellent concert on the 13th ult., when Stanford's "Revenge" and Gounod's "By Babylon's Wave" were given in a manner that reflected great credit upon Mr. White's conductorship.

Runcorn.—On the occasion of his recent marriage, Mr. William Cooke, organist and choirmaster of St. Paul's Church, Widnes, was the recipient of a handsome mahogany Chippendale music cabinet from the choir and a set of Tennyson's poetical works, handsomely bound in morocco, from the congregation.

St. Albans.—The St. Albans Oratorio Society, on March 22, gave a praiseworthy performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," in the Assembly Room, Town Hall. Miss Eva Weston, Miss Eliza Thomas, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Daniel Price sang the solos with power and refinement; and Mr. W. H. Speer conducted with his usual marked ability.

Salisbury.—The Sarum Choral Society inaugurated its fifty-first season, on the 19th ult., with a performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul." There was an excellent orchestra, conducted on this occasion by Mr. T. Aylward—Mr. Bowey having been unfortunately incapacitated by illness. Another absentee was the Countess of Radnor, who was replaced by Miss Isa Wells; the other vocalists being Madame Marie Moody, Miss Elsie Mackenzie, Mr. Trefelyn Davies, and Mr. Andrew Black. The choruses were most efficiently sung, and Mr. Bowey's efforts in the training both of the choir and orchestra were by no means overlooked. Admirable work is being done in the locality by this Society, which, it will not be forgotten, celebrated its Jubilee last year by an excellent performance of "Elijah."

Sedgley.—An excellent performance of Mr. C. Lee Williams's sacred cantata "The Last Night at Bethany" was given by the choir of the Parish Church, on Palm Sunday, and repeated on Good Friday. Mr. Williams's beautiful work, which had not been previously heard in the district, attracted large congregations. The choir acquitted itself admirably. The soloists, Mr. Jones and Master Clifford Fullwood, sang with taste and feeling. Mr. W. Richards, organist of the church, who conducted, is to be congratulated upon the success attending the performance; and Mr. Sidney T. Butler rendered valuable aid at the organ.

Skipton.—On the 11th ult. the Skipton Choral Society gave the closing concert of its sixteenth season in the Town Hall, and it proved very successful. Bennett's "May Queen" was performed, with Miss Lizzie Burgess, Miss Ada Ackernley, Miss A. Scott, Mr. Edwin Kellett, and Mr. William Thornton as soloists. Mr. Arthur Pearson ably conducted, Miss Dawson presided at the pianoforte and Mr. J. Turner Smith at the organ.

Southsea.—A very successful rendering of the "Song of Redemption" was given in the Victoria Wesleyan Church, on the 2nd ult., Easter Sunday evening, when Mr. B. Groves conducted.

Strabane (Co. Tyrone).—The Strabane Choral Society brought its season to a close by a very successful concert on the 14th ult., the audience being numerous and appreciative. The choir gave a very spirited rendering of Elgar's "The Banner of St. George." The accompaniment was supplied by Miss Brennan, honorary pianist, and a string band under the leadership of Mr. Hamill. The concert was most effectively conducted by Mr. C. J. Brennan. The soloists were Mrs. Graham, Mrs. Steele, Miss M. Smyth, Mr. Sylvester Smith, Mr. J. M'Quitty, and Mr. J. C. Herdman. Violin solos were contributed by Mr. G. M. Elliot.

Swansea.—Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was admirably rendered at Bethesda Chapel on March 23. The soloists were Miss May John, Miss M. L. Davies, and Mr. Tod Jones. Miss E. Benjamin ably accompanied, and Mr. T. S. Thomas was the successful conductor.

Tunbridge Wells.—The Christ Church Choral Class, under the direction of Mr. R. S. Johnson, performed Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," at the Town Hall, on the 18th ult. A full orchestra assisted, and the cantata was, on the whole, well rendered, the solo parts being undertaken by Miss Mabel Greenstead, Mr. F. J. Ascough, and Mr. E. Oliver. The second part of the concert consisted of a miscellaneous selection, in which several other artists, in addition to those named, took part.

Upholland.—On Wednesday, the 12th ult., Mr. Ch. H. Moody conducted a meritorious performance of Gaul's "Ruth," given under the auspices of the Upholland Choral Society. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, and included Schumann's "Gipsy Life" and Pinsuti's "In this hour."

Wallington.—An excellent concert was given on March 23, by the Wallington Musical Association, under the conductorship of Mr. E. W. Grascock. The principal works chosen for performance were Barnby's "Rebekah" and Goetz's "By the Waters of Babylon." The chorus, though small, acquitted itself remarkably well, and a word of praise is due to the soloists, Mrs. Upward, Mr. E. J. Cason, and Mr. Frank Ward, who discharged their duties very efficiently.

Wigan.—A Commemoration performance of Haydn's "Creation" was given in the Drill Hall, on the 5th ult., by the Wigan and District Choral Society. The concert was a farewell and benefit to Mr. C. H. Moody, who is leaving Wigan for Coventry. The hall was filled by an enthusiastic and fashionable audience. Miss Lilian Coomber, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Watkin Mills were the principals. The orchestra was largely augmented by a section of the Hallé Orchestra. The chorus was well balanced and powerful, and Mr. C. H. Moody conducted—for the last time in Wigan—a fine all-round performance. On the following Monday the committee presented Mr. Moody with a handsome cheque, at their general meeting, "in recognition of his onerous and capable work as conductor of the Society," coupled with the wish that he might be as successful in making friends in Coventry as he had been in Wigan. The mayor presided over a farewell dinner to Mr. Moody, at the Royal Hotel, and the clergy, wardens, sidesmen, and choir of the Parish Church presented him with a handsome gold hunter watch.

Woodstock.—On the 6th ult. a very successful concert was given in the Town Hall by the Woodstock Choral Society. Van Bree's "St. Cecilia's Day" was performed. Miss Margaret Furneaux sang the solos with great acceptance and Dr. Elsmore ably conducted.

Worcester.—The Worcester Musical Society gave an admirable performance of Haydn's "Creation" in the Public Hall, on the 11th ult., under the capable conductorship of Mr. W. Mann Dyson. The soloists were Miss Alice Phillips, Mr. Henry Large, and Mr. W. J. Ineson, all of whom gave great satisfaction. It is thirty years since the work was last given in this city.

Yeovil.—A successful performance of Haydn's "Creation" (Parts I. and II.), followed by a miscellaneous programme, was given by the Yeovil Philharmonic Society, on the 18th ult., in the Assembly Rooms. The solo parts were well rendered by Miss Edith Kingsford, Mr. Sidney Blandford, and Mr. Norman Kendall. Mr. Frank E. Bastick conducted and Mr. B. B. Swaffield was the accompanist.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. A. R. C. Charles, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Laurance, Catsfield, Battle.—Mr. William Reed, to St. Andrew's Church, Toronto.—Mr. R. W. Robson, Organist and Choirmaster to Prittlewell Parish Church, Southend.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. A. J.—The meaning of the term "authentic" is variously stated. It is derived from the Greek verb αὐθεντέω = to rule, to assume authority over; as if the authentic modes ruled and had superiority over their respective plagal modes. They are also called authentic as being the true modes promulgated by the authority of St. Ambrose, or as authentically derived from the ancient Greek system. To the four authentic modes associated with the name of St. Ambrose, St. Gregory added four others, directly derived from them, and thus called Plagal Modes, from πλάγιος = oblique, borrowed. The two forms of the perfect cadence were distinguished as the Authentic and the Plagal from the two main divisions of the ancient Church modes above referred to. In the former the tonic chord is preceded by that of the dominant; in the latter (the Plagal cadence) the tonic chord is preceded by that of the subdominant.

Choirmaster.—S. S. Wesley's tune "Aurelia" first appeared in "A Selection of Psalms and Hymns, arranged for the public services of the Church of England, by the Rev. C. Kemble. The music selected, arranged and partly composed by Samuel Sebastian Wesley, 1864." It is therein set to "Jerusalem the golden" (hence its name, "Aurelia"), and the other two well-known sections of Bernard's "De contemptu mundi" ("Brief life is here our portion" and "For thee, O dear, dear country"), which he wrote at Clugny in the twelfth century.

G. L.—Purcell's "Sacred Music," edited by Vincent Novello, is published in four volumes, price 31s. 6d. each. Of these, Vols. I., II., and III. consist of verse anthems in major keys, verse anthems in minor keys, and full anthems, hymns, sacred songs, &c., respectively; Vol. IV. consists of services and chants. All these anthems, &c., may, however, be obtained separately, and the most popular are issued in octavo size. J. S. Bach's Motets are published separately, but they could easily be bound up in one volume.

Ambitious.—If, as you seem to think, your voice is breaking, by all means stop singing, or you may ruin it. There is no reason why you should not have a good voice after the breaking period, but, as you say, you must "be careful." You should wait until your voice is properly "settled" before you commence its training. In the matter of diet, &c., live abstemiously and take regular exercise in the open air.

Wm. D.—Supplementing the information we gave in our last issue (p. 270), we may add that Schubert sketched (in a kind of pianoforte score) the Scherzo and Trio of his B minor Symphony, consisting of 128 bars. This draft is printed (together with some interesting particulars relating to the Symphony) in the "Revisionsbericht, Instrumentalmusik, Serie I.—VIII." of Schubert's works.

Myra.—Sterndale Bennett's Capriccio in D minor (Op. 2) is in regular first-movement form in regard to its outline and succession of keys. The second subject, originally in the key of the orthodox relative major, returns in that of the tonic major, the key signature being altered to two sharps. The Coda, however, is in D minor.

Tempo.—It is almost impossible to give suggested metronome indications for the tunes you mention. Much would depend upon the size of the church and the number of people in the congregation. Use your own judgment, having regard to the character of the words, but do not allow the tunes to drag.

Organist.—We should advise a little daily practice, but on no account must the voice be strained or allowed to become tired. At the age of fifteen, sixteen, or seventeen, according to the health and constitution of the pupil, a course of judicious training should be commenced under a good teacher.

W. R. H.—Raff's Organ Prelude and Fugue in E minor may be played at about ♪ = 92 for the Prelude and ♩ = 92 for the Fugue.

G.—Beethoven's "Farewell (or Adieu) to the piano" is not, so far as we are aware, "arranged for the organ." It is a bogus concoction and should be shunned.

 Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

The Rolling Seasons. 7th 1,000. ..	Sol-fa, 1s.; O.N., 1s. 6d.

Orchestral Parts are also printed. Time, about 35 minutes.

Extracts from Press Notices and opinions:—Whole Cantata was a treat to hear.—Strongly advise all Organists and Choirmasters to get it.—An attractive and splendid little work; abounds in exquisite passages.—Repeated it in two neighbouring localities by request.—Created such enthusiasm that we are repeating it on Sunday next.—Beautiful, artistic, and effective.—Lovely and charming, striking and spirited.—Full of rhythm and cadence, sparkling and bright, devotional and grand.—Much enjoyed; a pity it is not twice as long, &c.

New and Popular Voluntary Books	each, net, 1s. 6d.

Seventeen Voluntaries in each Book. Written on Two Staves, with the Pedal Part indicated. Book 1, the 4th edition. Book 2, just published.

A Cathedral Organist writes:—Attractive pieces, a valuable acquisition to numbers of Organists. Other opinions:—A collection of real gems.—First class; hope another No. will be ready shortly.—The most tuneful and effective selection I have seen; I wish you published a dozen books.—Congregation are never tired of hearing them, &c.

New Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C. 5th 1,000	4d.

Price Sixpence.

NOVELLO'S

VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. II.
CONTAINING
50 DOUBLE CHANTS.
Price Sixpence.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. II., Chant No. 23, by Lord Mornington, which is included on account of its great popularity.

OF

REVISED AND EDITED BY

SIR J. STAINER,

M.A., Mus.D., Oxford; Hon. D.C.L. and Mus. Doc., Durham.

PREFACE.

The only way in which the Editor of a book of reference can show his gratitude to the public for demanding new editions on the exhaustion of the old, is by doing his best to keep its contents up to date. The reviser has done so; many articles have been entirely re-written or enlarged—e.g., Copyright and Licensing, Madrigal, Mass, Opera, Pianoforte, Pitch, and many of those little slips which show such persistent survival in works of this kind have been removed. The Editor is grateful to many, whose names are among the authors and helpers, for their share in this last revision.

BALLADE

In A minor
FOR FULL ORCHESTRA composed by

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

(Op. 33.)

Arrangement for Pianoforte Solo, 2s.
String Parts, 4s. 6d.
Wind Parts, 10s. 6d. Full Score, in the Press.

THE TIMES.

Wonderfully interesting, quite beautiful and characteristic. It is marked by the same strong instinct for beauty of tone-colouring and for characteristic turns of melody that has distinguished his work in more modest surroundings, and it is a most favourable specimen of his powers. The theme, which we should be warranted in naming the second subject, is most fascinating in its naïve beauty, and placed as it is in contrast to a strenuous and most original theme of bluff and almost savage character, it is thrown into the best light. The feeling for real effect manifested throughout the work is most remarkable, and it is no wonder that the excellent performance given by the band called forth an exceptionally hearty outburst of enthusiasm.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie led his band very brilliantly through the fiery and passionate Orchestral Ballade.... This piece certainly loses nothing by repetition. The warmth and spirit of its themes and the luxuriance of its instrumentation are in every way characteristic of modern art and latter-day freedom of expression. Thus rightly classified, Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's Ballade is a fine and impressive thing, which should surely be the forerunner of much more music in the same picturesque and imaginative vein.

MORNING POST.

It is a striking work, and it possesses a masterful force and half untamed and fiery exuberance that give it memorable distinctiveness. . . . These two themes and the initial subject are treated with great skill and command of the orchestra, the work in its entirety possessing a life and individuality that fix it in the memory, and increase expectation of what its composer may write in the future.

STANDARD.

The Orchestral Ballad produced for the first time in public to-night is a remarkable and striking work, and possesses in notable degree the peculiar blending of barbaric and Western modes of expression which is so distinguishing a feature of this young composer's efforts. . . . The whole work, indeed, seems to glow with intensity and life, and it holds the attention with relentless grasp. The success of the work to-night was instantaneous.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

The work occupies barely a quarter of an hour in performance, but it is long since a Festival novelty has provided fifteen minutes packed so full of excitement and charm. In its alternations of barbaric gaiety with languid swaying melody, in its wayward rhythms and strange exotic harmonies, this remarkable work provokes comparisons with the best work of the Bohemian school, and emerges with credit from the ordeal of comparison.

ATHENÆUM.

A short composition, yet of such vivid imagination, rich colour, and wise restraint, coupled with youthful boldness, that it is a forecast of a great and brilliant career—if only health and strength continue, and if Mr. Taylor escapes from the many dangers which beset a rising artist. The composer at the close of the performance was received with marked enthusiasm.

CARACTACUS

A CANTATA
For Soprano, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra the words written for music by

H. A. ACWORTH, C.I.E.

the music by

EDWARD ELGAR.

Vocal Score, Price Three Shillings and Sixpence.
Paper boards, 4s.; cloth, gilt, 5s.; String Parts (in the Press); Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.; Vocal Parts, each 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Elgar's music has the inestimable merit that it seldom, if ever, conveys even a momentary suggestion of any other composer's work. All that he has to say is his own. . . . In some respects the representative themes, of which there are quite a formidable number, are treated with great skill and originality, and as each scene is worked up to its logical climax, so the series grows in interest up to the most beautiful point in the composition, a "lament" in which the voice of the defeated king is supported by the choir in a movement of such poignant expression and such sincerely-felt emotion that the fact of its being in the strange rhythm of seven crotchets in a bar is quite forgotten.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In "Caractacus" we find music that interests no less deeply than it charms, and for the most part these two qualities run side by side. . . . For the present I can do no less than offer sincere compliments to an English composer who speaks with so strong and commanding a voice.

THE STANDARD.

In "Caractacus" we have a work of which it may be said without the slightest hesitation that it is one of the greatest honours to English musical art that has been produced for many years. The wealth of melody in the score from the first bar to the last never fails, and it is ever fresh and unlaboured.

DAILY MAIL.

The cantata was received with enthusiasm and at the close the composer was recalled. The work is at once modern and original. There is a wealth of melody, and the barbaric grandeur of the triumphal procession through the streets of Rome is worthy of a Berlioz or a Wagner.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Elgar obviously knows how to interest the general public without sacrificing a whit of his musicianship. He is a melodist and a master of picturesque orchestral writing, while his choral workmanship, without being pedantic, is usually highly effective.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Elgar's musical personality is one to reckon with as a fact in art. He is academic in the excellent sense that he allows a real character, a genuine temperament, to be guided by the influence of the best masters; and he is wise to keep himself free from personal eccentricities, while at the same time fully giving the rein to his personal accomplishments. The result is that we get something so new in English music that one naturally hails it with respect and avowed expectation.

YORKSHIRE POST.

In the refreshing vigour of the music, the extraordinary grip of the orchestra, the mastery over all its resources, the keen appreciation of its colour, Mr. Elgar is quite supreme among our composers, and the freedom and force of his writing for the band are indeed remarkable. He is, however, not only capable of energetic effects, he can also give expression to extreme tenderness.

MR. CHARLES TREE

Engaged for Concerts in Paris, July, 1899.

"Elijah."—"The great artistic success of the evening, however, was Mr. Tree's conception and rendering of the music allotted to the Prophet. From opening to finish his fine declamation and rich full voice gave expression to his highly intelligent reading in a most dramatic and impressive manner, which those present will not soon forget. He is undoubtedly the finest bass we have ever had in the district, and received quite an ovation."—Clydebank and Renfrew Press.

"Judas Maccabæus."—"Mr. Tree called forth loud encomiums for his very fine voice and distinctly grand style. He was exceptionally good in 'I feel the Deity' and 'Arm, arm,' while in 'Be comforted' and 'The Lord worketh wonders' his brilliant and powerful renderings more than surpassed the expectations of his audience."—Freeman's Journal.

"Golden Legend."—"The one member to break the bonds of austerity to give us humanity was Mr. Tree as Lucifer. Very fine, vigorous, and correct, his heart was in his work."—Dover Telegraph.

"Faust" (Berlioz).—"Mr. Tree has the histrionic instinct strongly developed. His dramatic delivery of the Mephisto music was startlingly realistic, the effect vivid in the extreme."—Ealing Guardian.

"Acis and Galatea."—"Mr. Tree was unknown to Blackburn, and some curiosity was felt as to whether he would be fully equal to the task. Any lingering doubt was quickly dispelled. He has a voice of wide range and power, and is a fine singer whom we hope to hear again."—Blackburn Times.

"Faust" (Gounod).—"His was a magnificent declamation. He threw himself heart and soul into the Mephisto part, infusing a tremendous amount of realistic spirit."—Tunbridge Wells Advertiser.

"Light of the World" and "Ancient Mariner."—"Mr. Tree sang with fine effect. He has a wonderful voice, and was altogether excellent."—Tunbridge Wells Courier.

"Samson."—"His fine baritone was keenly admired. 'Honour and Arms' was magnificently rendered, and 'How willing' most sympathetic."—Wellingboro' News.

"Rose Maiden."—"The principals acquitted themselves admirably, Mr. Tree especially meeting with a great reception."—Blackpool Times.

The "Creation."—"At the eleventh hour Mr. Tree was called upon to sing the bass music. He has an uncommonly rich voice, and in solos and duets was heard with great effect."—Darwen News.

Oratorios, Concerts, &c. Address, 23, Clifton Road, Maida Vale, W.

MR. ARTHUR BARLOW

(BASS)

For Oratorio, Opera, and Concerts.

"Samson" (Handel).—"Mr. Arthur Barlow, who is steadily working his way to the front as an oratorio singer, threw plenty of vigour into his rendering of 'Honour and Arms," and made his mark also in Manoah's air 'How willing my paternal love,' which he interpreted with notable feeling and expression."—London Daily Telegraph, September 19, 1898.

". . . . But the great triumph of the concert was achieved by Mr. Arthur Barlow, whose voice and method are beyond praise. After 'Honour and Arms' he received a genuine ovation."—Yorkshire Post, April 19, 1899.

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD,
PRECENTOR OF ETON.

"And all about them, as they played,
What poets guessed, and sages planned,
And old undying music, made
Prophetic by a master-hand."
A. C. BENSON.

"The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places," says Dr. Lloyd in the old-fashioned high-walled garden of his house in Eton College. The house itself, with its long frontage and two-storied elevation, was, until recently, the habitation of the Head Master. It dates from the time of James I., and its history is not without interest. A range of buildings had been erected in the College between the years 1603 and 1606. Part of this structure was a granary, as the records mention a "great window next the high way where the corne is taken up," which "great window" now forms a feature of Dr. Lloyd's staircase. Another portion was used as studies and dormitories for the Clerks and Commensals. Part of the building was subsequently devoted to uses of an important typographical nature. Sir Henry Savile (1549-1622), "the most learned Englishman in profane literature in the reign of Elizabeth," and who founded and endowed the Savilian Professorships of Astronomy and Geometry at Oxford, was appointed Provost of Eton in 1596 by Queen Elizabeth. Savile is known to posterity by his magnificent edition of the complete works of St. Chrysostom, the "first work of learning on a great scale published in England." The edition was set up in the original Greek, from a special fount of "silver" type procured from abroad, owing to the scarcity of Greek type in England. It was printed by John Norton, the King's printer, in the building subsequently transformed into a house and now occupied by Dr. Lloyd as Precentor of Eton. The first volume of the St. Chrysostom was issued in 1610, the last in 1613. The total cost of production of the eight tomes was £8,000, of which the paper alone absorbed £2,000; therefore it is not surprising to learn that the enterprise brought Savile more fame than money. It is not improbable that the printing-press of John Norton occupied the room now forming Dr. Lloyd's spacious study, in which wainscoted and old-world apartment he genially relates the "ups and downs" of his varied and interesting career.

EARLY YEARS.

Charles Harford Lloyd was born on October 16, 1849, at Thornbury, a small market town in Gloucestershire, near the banks of the Severn and eleven miles north of Bristol. He is the son of the late Edmund Lloyd, of the firm of Messrs. Crossman and Lloyd, solicitors, of Thornbury, whose business is now carried on by Dr. Lloyd's eldest brother. Charlie, as his intimates call him, began to play the pianoforte at a very early age. He received his first instruction in music from a governess. When he was ten years old he played the organ at the neighbouring church of Rangeworthy, of which his brother-in-law, the Rev. E. G. Penny, was the vicar. As a boy he also officiated at the near village of Falfield. He attended the Grammar School of his native town for his general education. At one time there was some idea of his being sent to Tenbury as a pupil, but his widowed mother considered that there were reasons against the proposal.

In 1862 (ætat thirteen) he took lessons in pianoforte and harmony from Mr. John Barrett, of Bristol, who wisely introduced his young pupil to Bach and Beethoven. "Here is my copy of 'the 48' and the date—August 28, 1862—when I learnt the first prelude," says Dr. Lloyd, as he takes down the treasured volume from his book-shelves. Asked to contribute to this article any recollections of his pupil of thirty-seven years ago, Mr. John Barrett writes:—

> During the year 1862, and to the end of 1865, it was my great privilege to be pianoforte teacher to Charles Harford Lloyd. I look back upon those Thursdays, when I journeyed from Bristol to Thornbury, as some of the red-letter days of my life.
> It was a grand experience to me to watch him, as he boldly attacked the works of the great masters, more especially Bach—he simply revelled in playing the Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues. He must have been in his thirteenth year when he commenced the study of them. At an early age he began as a composer, and frequently have I looked through the MS. of a composition, which was to be rendered by the members of that truly happy and musical family who lived so near the church and castle of Thornbury.

The "Sea-King's daughter from over the sea" in 1863 awakened the muse of Master Lloyd, whereby he composed "The Pearl of Denmark" Mazurka, the said "Pearl" being the Princess of Wales. Tennyson attracted his boyish fancy, as he set to music "What does little birdie say?" as a part-song, and "Sweet and low" as a solo, both of which are published.

ROSSALL.—THE SCHOOL SONG.

From 1865 to 1868 young Lloyd was a pupil at Rossall School, in Lancashire. Here he took some organ lessons from the late Charles Handel Tovey, organist and music-master of the school. Unlike Mr. Barrett, Mr. Tovey ran the risk of lowering his pupil's taste by supplying him with the puff pastry fare of Batiste, Wély, and Co. At Rossall, Lloyd occasionally played the organ in the school chapel, and composed "Carmen Rossalliense," which became the school-song, and remains so to this day. In after years he was invited to become organist of the school, but declined the invitation.

A friend of his boyhood was the late Lady Jenkinson, who had been a pupil of Thalberg's. At her ladyship's house Lloyd met Ouseley and the late Mr. Gambier Parry. The latter invited him to pay a short visit to Highnam Court. Here he first met his attached friend of after years, Hubert Parry. He remembers that they both stayed up till the small hours of the morning "making music" together in the drawing-room, and that Parry sang "Is not His word like a fire?" very quickly!

AN UNDERGRADUATE AT OXFORD.

In 1868 Lloyd obtained an open scholarship, of the value of £40 per annum, at Magdalen Hall (now Hertford College), Oxford, where he matriculated October 17, 1868. Theology was then his bent and he had "a hankering after ordination." To this end he attended the Divinity lectures of Liddon and Payne Smith. He took his B.A. degree in 1872, taking a second class in Classical Mods. and also in Theology. But although his studies seemed to be leading him towards a clerical career, music was quietly taking possession of him and permeating his whole life.

Dr. Lloyd's recollections of his undergraduate period at Oxford in regard to music are of a specially interesting nature. The name of one good man and true is uppermost in his thoughts—that of John Stainer, then organist of Magdalen College, who was the life and soul of all musical happenings in the University. "I can hardly express my gratitude to Stainer," says Dr. Lloyd. "He gave me a term's lessons in harmony, but beyond that I gained an experience of untold value to me in watching him as he played the organ and accompanied in his own inimitable manner." One pleasant result of those harmony lessons at Oxford was a pleasing little part-song, "A sunny shaft," which subsequently found its way into The Musical Times. With the exception of these few lessons, however, and those of his boyhood already referred to, Dr. Lloyd has been entirely self-taught. His career furnishes another instance, more than once dwelt upon in these columns, of the inestimable advantages that any young man or woman may derive from exercising keen observation, making the best use of their opportunities, and developing the faculty of "picking up." Are not many students of music in the present day over-taught?

MUSICKINGS AT OXFORD.

Harford Lloyd took his degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford in 1871, a year earlier than that of Bachelor of Arts, be it noted. His examiners were Ouseley, Corfe, and Stainer, and his exercise was a setting of Psalm viii. He did much music-making of a practical nature at Oxford. His financial resources were none too abundant, and he was glad to play the harmonium at Pembroke College Chapel and to conduct the Glee Club of that College of which his good friend, Canon Evans, was the Master. He frequently played pianoforte duets with H.R.H. the late Prince Leopold (afterwards Duke of Albany), who was "very kind" to him. On the first occasion of their playing together, Lloyd said to the Prince: "Which part will you take, Sir, treble or bass?" The Prince replied: "Bass, because the Queen always plays the treble." On two occasions—private concerts at Cowley House, the residence of the late Sir Benjamin Brodie—he and Hubert Parry were associated together as substitutes for an orchestra in performances of the "Hymn of Praise" and "Athalie," when the future director of the Royal College of Music presided at the pianoforte and the embryo Precentor of Eton evolved harmony from out the harmonium.

"HARMONOMANIACS."

The mention of the harmonium naturally leads to the subject of the "Harmonomaniacs." As no musical dictionary is likely to give any explanation of this somewhat demented term, it may be desirable to state that it was the title of a society of Oxford undergraduates—musical merry-making men mentally misrepresented in the designation thereof. Harford Lloyd was the conductor of this jocose fraternity. A copy of the programme of the concert given on June 18, 1870, by the said (if not the staid) "Harmonomaniacs" is before us. The concert opened with a "medley overture" played by "The Band"—such as it probably was. Following the overture was "an opening song," entitled "Commem.," composed and sung by "S. H. Gatty." Here is a specimen stanza:—

In order chronological I'll now proceed to speak
Of the various entertainments in the programme for the week;
And first (there are so many things your memory to tax)
I'll remind you that you're listening to "Harmonomaniacs."

The twenty numbers in the programme included Thalberg's "Masaniello," played on the pianoforte by "C. H. Lloyd"; Sullivan's "Sigh no more, ladies," sung by "J. Edgar Sheppard" (now Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's); and, by way of a finale, the band played "Skedaddle," which may or may not have consisted of a series of rapid runs.

THE "O.U.M.C."

But music of a much more serious nature stirred the energies of the young undergraduate of Hertford College. Exeter College could boast of a capital football player and a first-rate musician to boot, in the person of an old Etonian named Hubert Parry. This disciple of Orpheus had organised quartet parties and other chamber music performances in his and other undergraduates' rooms. Thus had he prepared the way for the establishment of the Oxford University Musical Club, which was founded by Lloyd in April, 1872. The Club (or, as it is known in Oxford, the O.U.M.C.) became an important public institution which flourishes to this day. During the present term the 658th meeting (or concert) is announced, and amongst the honorary members are Dr. Joachim and M. Paderewski, both of whom have played at the "meetings."

Eton College Chapel.

Amongst other friends of his undergraduate days at Oxford were Professor Donkin and his sons, all of them fiddlers, who were the first to introduce Dr. Lloyd to chamber music. Another congenial spirit, and one of his best friends, was Sir John Stainer's successor in the organistship of Magdalen College, Sir Walter Parratt, now so near a neighbour. "I owe a very great deal to Parratt," he says.

A PRIVATE TUTOR.

He had graduated in Arts and Music, and therefore the choice of a career became an urgent matter for consideration. This was the struggling-point in his life. "I was hanging on at Oxford," he says, "not knowing what to do. I coached fellows in various subjects—Political Economy amongst them. There was some idea of my becoming an Inspector of Schools and, mirabile dictu, an Inspector of Factories! But I became a private tutor—first to one of the Vernon Harcourts at Nuneham and afterwards to the sons of Lord Inverclyde (then Mr. John Burns), of Cunard fame, at Castle Wemyss. During the winter residence of the Burns family in Glasgow, I composed in my lonely lodgings my eight-part anthem 'Art thou weary?' originally setting it to Mr. Gladstone's Latin version ('Scis te lassum?') of that hymn. At Skelmorlie, on the Clyde, I sometimes played the organ in the Presbyterian Church. I saw a great deal of Millais and his wife in Scotland, and they were very kind to me. In 1873-74, previously to my sojourn on the Clyde, I had travelled as tutor to a pupil in France and Italy, and I used to go to the opera nearly every night in order to gain further knowledge of music. In Italy, through an introduction from the Millais family, I visited the Countess Gigliucci (Clara Novello), who, with her daughters, sang to me 'Lift thine eyes,' and it was very beautifully done." Upon his return to Thornbury Dr. Lloyd received a very gratifying letter from the Countess, of which the following is an extract:—

Fermo, Marche, Italia.
19th July, 1874.

My dear Sir,

Corelli's music and your welcome letter, dated 13th, reached me duly two days ago. Both inexpressibly charmed us all. Besides its own beauty, Corelli's trio has endless agreeable associations for me, to which you have added others, first by your masterly playing and now by your most kind attention in sending this copy of the two last movements. (Pity the first is wanting.) I know nothing more satisfactory than to discover that those whose talents we may admire in society, have amiability and character to match, as in your case.

On Mr. Henry Littleton's return to Rome from Naples, I told him what a musical treat he had lost, and your musical intentions and of my card of introduction.

. . . .

Auguring you, from all our party, all happiness and success,
Believe me to remain, My dear Sir,
Yours very sincerely and obliged,
Clara Gigliucci.

The "musical intentions" referred to in the above communication were not unconnected with publishing aspirations, and the Countess's "card of introduction" to Mr. Henry Littleton was the beginning of a long and pleasant connection between Dr. Lloyd and Messrs. Novello, which still exists, and in regard to which he says: "But for their helping hand I doubt if many of my compositions would have seen the light. As it is, I have seldom if ever shown them anything which they have refused to publish."

GLOUCESTER.

The year 1876 proved to be an all-eventful one in the life of Harford Lloyd. With its opening months came the parting of the ways. The finger of destiny pointed to the road that leadeth unto music, and thither the young private tutor journeyed. At the close of 1875 overtures had been semi-officially made to him on behalf of the Dean and Chapter of Gloucester that he should undertake the classical mastership of the Cathedral Choir School in that city. The negotiations were carried on by his old friend Canon Evans, the Master of Pembroke, who was also Canon of Gloucester. Lloyd had previously visited Gloucester, when he met Dr. S. S. Wesley, then organist of the Cathedral, at luncheon, on the invitation of Mrs. Ellicott, at the Bishop's Palace. On that occasion Lloyd played a pianoforte solo and Wesley followed with a sonata by Spohr, one of his favourite composers. They afterwards adjourned to the Cathedral, when he (Wesley) extemporised a fugue on the organ. Lloyd then did likewise for half-an-hour while Wesley, seated by Mrs. Ellicott, listened with great attention. In recalling the incident Mrs. Ellicott says: "While Mr. Lloyd was playing Dr. Wesley said to me, 'You prepared me for hearing a very fine pianist, but you never told me that he was an organist; I haven't heard such playing as this for years.'"

During the progress of the correspondence in regard to the Cathedral school mastership, an event happened that definitely settled the future career of Harford Lloyd, who was still a private tutor in Scotland. The distinguished organist of Gloucester had long been in indifferent health. On April 19, 1876, the heart of S. S. Wesley ceased to beat, and his troubled spirit was at last calmed—but in death. The Dean and Chapter had no hesitation in offering the vacant appointment to Lloyd, thus giving him larger scope for the exercise of his undoubted abilities. He accepted their offer and they never had the slightest cause to regret their action. There is no doubt that the influence of Mrs. Ellicott played an important part in these negotiations, and probably Dr. Lloyd himself hardly knows how much he is indebted to this warm-hearted lady for her help in turning the stream of his life into the channel for which nature seemed to have destined it.

The appointment, however, of a young unknown man, and one inexperienced in Cathedral music, as the successor of the great Wesley excited a strong feeling of dissatisfaction in certain musical circles, but the wisdom of the choice was proved. Lloyd began his duties on Midsummer day, 1876. Owing to Wesley's illness and other causes which need not be mentioned here, the choir at Gloucester was then in a state of insubordination. But the new organist speedily won all hearts by his genial tactfulness and quiet decision. Soon after his appointment he instituted special musical services in the Nave of the Cathedral and organised an entirely volunteer choir of ninety singers for this purpose. The lay clerks declined to take any part in these services. On one of these occasions Minor Canon Edgar Sheppard (now Sub-Dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's) sang the tenor solos in "The Messiah."

THE FESTIVALS OF 1877 AND 1880.

The Gloucester organistship carries with it the important office of conductor of the Festival of the Three Choirs, which is held in Gloucester every three years. Dr. Lloyd's first Festival was in 1877, for which he specially selected Brahms's noble Requiem. It is no easy task for a young man with practically no experience in conducting an orchestra to face a body of London professional players; but Lloyd, with his usual thoroughness, had taken due pains to equip himself for the trying ordeal. He was then teaching one day in each week at a ladies' school at Malvern. He would rush up to London just in time to attend a Richter concert on a Monday night and return to Malvern by the newspaper train the next morning in time to instruct the fair damsels at the school. As to the manner in which he discharged his duties of conductor at this his first Festival, we venture to quote the opinion of the "special correspondent" of The Musical Times, as recorded in this journal in October, 1877:—

> In the course of our notice we have incidentally mentioned the excellent manner in which the new organist, Mr. Harford Lloyd, conducted several important works; but our testimony to his general efficiency during an arduous week, both in the Cathedral and the Shire Hall, we have left, as one of the most pleasurable duties, to the end. We know nothing as to the amount of experience Mr. Lloyd may have had in conducting before he accepted his present office, but we have no hesitation in affirming that not only his skill in conveying to the executants an accurate knowledge of the tempi of the several pieces, but his evident intimate acquaintance with the scores, and the intelligence he evinced in the endeavour to realise every point indicated by the composer merit the warmest eulogium.

Dr. Lloyd's second and last Festival in 1880, when he introduced Beethoven's Mass in D, was even more successful in results and proved him to be a conductor of special attainments. This Festival was also rendered memorable by the production of the first important work of Sir Hubert Parry—his setting of Shelley's "Prometheus Unbound." A very interesting testimony to Lloyd's powers, and one that was specially valuable by reason of its spontaneity, came from the leader of the band, "dear old Sainton," who wrote the following letter immediately after the Festival:—

> Conteville,
> Près Boulogne-sur-Mer,
> My dear Mr. Lloyd, Sept. 13, 1880.
> Here I am since last evening, and I will not allow one day to pass without expressing to you my sincere thanks for all your kindness and attention to me during this Festival.
> But what I have more at heart is to tell you how happy I have been to play under your conductorship, and how much I have admired—sincerely admired—all your doings in carrying out the sublime ideas of Beethoven in his chef d'œuvre. It was a hard task indeed, from which you came out quite victorious.
> In speaking for myself I am certain I interpret the feeling of every member of the orchestra, if I tell you that you have won the heart of every one by your kindness, your amiability, and, more than all, by your talent, of which your "Magnificat" is an incontestable proof.
> Let me add one line more to tell you the deep, very deep impression "Prometheus" has made upon me. There is the étincelle électrique so seldom found now-a-days. With a fine refined performance, Mr. Parry's work must create a great sensation.
> Good-bye, dear Mr. Lloyd. With our united kind regards to Miss Lloyd and yourself,
> I remain, most sincerely yours,
> P. Sainton.

What more natural than that Lloyd should forward this charming letter to his friend, Hubert Parry, whose work had not been received by the critics as Lloyd thought it deserved? The reply of the composer of "Prometheus" is no less characteristic and "unbuttoned," to use a Beethovenism:—

> Rustington, Worthing,
> My dear Lloyd, Oct. 27th, 1880.
> What a brick you are! and what a pig am I not to have written before to thank you for the short note you were so considerate as to send from Scotland for my comfort. Indeed I am most heartily pleased with old Sainton's words. It is most encouraging to have a purely spontaneous commendation from such a quarter; and I think it also very kind of him to write it.
> I hope you have had a thorough good holiday, and feel as hearty as possible again. It is a severe bout to go through that Festival. More than any man ought to be burdened with, much less a sensitive and highly strung musician, when he wants his nerves to be in the smoothest and steadiest trim. I do think you covered yourself with honour in every respect; and my own thankfulness to you will I hope last as long as life. I suppose you are publishing the Service. Mind and let me have a copy, like a good man, when it is ready.
> And so farewell, and the best of luck to you always.
> With a most friendly greeting to your sister,
> Ever yours,
> C. Hubert H. Parry.

TWO PUPILS—MESSRS. BREWER AND SINCLAIR.

The six years (1876-82) at Gloucester proved to be a delightful experience. "I have been happy everywhere," Dr. Lloyd remarks. How few can say that! Two of his articled pupils at Gloucester have made their mark and become cathedral organists, from both of whom much may be expected. Mr. A. Herbert Brewer now fills his old master's place at Gloucester, and Mr. G. R. Sinclair is organist of Hereford Cathedral, both "Three Choirs" Cathedrals and at both of which Wesley was formerly organist. Mr. Sinclair, who left Dr. Lloyd to become the first organist of Truro Cathedral, sends the following "appreciation" of his old master:—

> It is very difficult to know what to say about a person for whom one has such an affection and regard as I have for my old master. It was through the late Sir F. A. G. Ouseley that I became Dr. Lloyd's pupil, at Gloucester, and I need hardly tell you that Sir Frederick held Lloyd in very high estimation. In fact, I remember his saying that he considered him to be the "ideal Cathedral Organist."
> I lived with Lloyd at Gloucester for a year and a half after leaving school, and his influence and example upon me can never be forgotten. One of his most marked characteristics is the conscientiousness which stamps all he does, and his intolerance of anything like sham. It has been said that a man's character is often betrayed in his accompaniment of the church service, and I am sure Lloyd's playing fully justifies the assertion. I shall never forget the way in which he used to accompany the Psalms on the old unrestored Gloucester organ, with its beautiful tone, but clumsy action. These accompaniments were full of variety and colour, but an unrefined treatment of any verse was never heard.
> He has a great gift for extemporization. This is specially demonstrated in his soft voluntaries before the service. One of these, which he afterwards wrote down for me, is published as an Allegretto in E in Novello's series of "Original Compositions for the Organ." He also possesses a great power of varying his harmonies. I heard him do this with marvellous effect in a verse of a hymn sung by all the boys in unison at Eton College Chapel only a few days ago. Though these harmonies were most unexpected, they were always free from any of that vulgarity one so constantly hears.
> As a composer he has been much appreciated, as is proved by the many commissions he has had for Festivals. At the present moment I can think of ten works which have been produced at the Festivals of the Three Choirs. Though his compositions show that his thoughts flow freely from his pen, yet the whole is subject to rigid revision; indeed, probably no composer reviews his work more than he himself does. He once remarked to me that many preachers should deliver about one-half of what they actually write, and he considered the same principle might be applied to their works by many composers.
> Lloyd's great tact, combined with his musical powers, made him a very successful festival conductor. Many will remember the great Gloucester Festival of 1880, with its fine performance of Beethoven's Missa Solennis in D. He was always prepared for the emergencies which a conductor has so often to face; in fact, I only once remember his being "done," and that was during a performance of the "Creation" in the Gloucester Shire Hall. The bells of a neighbouring church began to be rung soon after the concert had commenced. The noise was most distracting, whereupon Lloyd sent a chorister over to the belfry to tell the ringers that he would give them five shillings if they would stop. The answer came after more than a quarter of an hour's ringing, in these words: "Will stop when we get the money." They got it!

OXFORD AGAIN—CHRIST CHURCH.

Widespread and sincere regret was experienced in Gloucester when Dr. Lloyd accepted the invitation of Dean Liddell to become organist of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford, in succession to Dr. Corfe. All the Cathedral people at Gloucester were genuinely sorry at his departure and the severance of so pleasant a connection. Dr. Lloyd had certainly solved the problem of how to work harmoniously with the Cathedral clergy.

Canon Tinling wrote:—

> We shall miss you very much in Glo'ster—few will do so more than myself. I have often added to your labours, but in every instance in six long years I have met with true sympathy from you. May God's blessing rest upon you.

The Precentor, in a letter beginning "My dear Lloyd," bore similar testimony:

> All you have been kind enough to say with regard to kindness and courtesy on my part falls far short of what I can reciprocate of kind consideration on your part.

At Christ Church Cathedral, Harford Lloyd maintained the best traditions of his Gloucester period. During this, his second residence in Oxford (1882-92), he took his degree of Doctor in Music in 1890. He wrote the music for "Alcestis," performed in the new Theatre, Oxford, May 18-24, 1887. He was appointed to a specially created lectureship in music at Christ Church, and there discoursed on "Crotch," "English Glees," and "Form as exemplified in Beethoven's Sonatas." He also lectured in the Sheldonian Theatre for the Professor of Music (Sir John Stainer) on "Wagner's Siegfried Idyll." At various times he conducted the Oxford Choral Society, the Oxford Philharmonic Society, and the Oxford Orchestral Association, besides different College Societies; but the most important concerts he directed were a series of Public Classical Concerts organised by the University Musical Club on the initiative of Mr. W. H. Hadow and continued for six seasons (1891-1897). At these concerts symphonies, concertos, and other important works were played by picked London executants. After the first season Dr. Lloyd migrated to Eton, but at the request of the committee he continued to conduct the concerts for five subsequent seasons.

APPOINTMENTS AND COMPOSITIONS.

The strictly chronological sequence of events in Dr. Lloyd's life may be broken at this point in order to record his various distinctions and appointments, and also a list of his compositions. He took (at Oxford) the degree of Bachelor in Music in 1871; Bachelor of Arts, 1872; Master of Arts, 1875; and Doctor in Music, 1890; and he is an Honorary Member of the Royal Academy of Music, a Member of the Philharmonic Society, and a Fellow of the Royal College of Organists "without examination." He has at various times examined for musical degrees in the Universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London, and St. Andrews, and is one of the Examiners for the Associated Board of the Royal Academy and Royal College of Music. From 1887 to 1892 he was a teacher of the organ and composition at the Royal College of Music. He has also held the office of examiner for the Oxford Locals and the Oxford and Cambridge School examinations. He is conductor of the Eton and Windsor Choral Society and the Eton and Windsor Orchestral Society; moreover, he sings, under the baton of Sir Walter Parratt, in the Eton and Windsor Madrigal Society! It may also be mentioned that he was at one time a candidate for the organistship of Magdalen College Chapel, Oxford, and for the Professorship of Music at Edinburgh University (in 1891), though in the latter instance he withdrew his candidature.

As a composer Dr. Lloyd has done excellent work, and he has been in request at the various Festivals—Gloucester, Hereford, Worcester, and Leeds. One of his Festival compositions, the cantata "Hero and Leander," has attained a wide popularity amongst choral societies. The following is an attempt at a complete list of his compositions:—

VOCAL.

Cantatas, &c.—*"Hero and Leander" (Worcester, 1884); *"The Song of Balder" (Hereford, 1885); *"Andromeda" (Gloucester, 1886); "Alcestis" (Oxford, 1887); "The Longbeard's Saga," male voices (1887); "The Gleaners' Harvest," female voices (1888); *"A Song of Judgment" (Hereford, 1891); "Rossall" (1894); *"Ballad of Sir Ogie and the Ladie Elsie" (Hereford, 1894); "Hymn of Thanksgiving" (1897).

Services, &c.—Morning and Evening Service in E flat; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, in F, another setting in F (for soprano and baritone soli, chorus, and orchestra), and G; and Versicles, Responses and Litany for men's voices. Nine anthems, various hymn tunes, carols, &c.

Part-songs, various (including two in eight parts, sung at the Leeds and Worcester Festivals), songs, including "The garden of the heart," "Magdalen at St. Michael's gate," "Annette" (with clarinet obbligato), "In summer weather," "Hawke," "The Vigil," "A Song of Exmoor," &c.

INSTRUMENTAL.

Orchestral.—Concerto in F minor, for organ and orchestra (Gloucester, 1895); and a Festival Overture (Gloucester, 1898).

Chamber music.—Duo concertante for pianoforte and clarinet; Sonata for pianoforte and violin, in MS. (played at Oxford by Mr. James Taylor and Dr. Joachim); and Trio for pianoforte, clarinet, and bassoon, in MS.

Organ.—Sonata in D minor; Allegretto in E; Andante in A; Minuet in A; and various short pieces in "The Village Organist."

ETON.

To return to the biographical narrative. In 1892, upon the appointment of Sir Joseph Barnby to the Principalship of the Guildhall School of Music, Dr. Lloyd became Precentor of Eton College. He had unsuccessfully competed for the post seventeen years before, but now he was invited to fill it! His official title at Eton is Precentor and Instructor of Music—the former office he holds from the Provost and the latter under the Head Master; thus he is the "chief musician" in that great and historic school. Dr. Lloyd presides at the organ in the chapel (the stately edifice shown in our illustration) at "Morning Chapel," which is attended by the boys of the Upper School, when the service is short and simple. Every afternoon there is a full cathedral service, and, of course, on Sundays. The choristers are boys from the town and are educated by the College authorities, but not boarded as at present there is no residential choir school. There are six lay clerks in the choir, but on Sundays several of the masters and senior boys lend their aid with excellent effect. Dr. Lloyd also rehearses the Lower School boys in the Lower Chapel, where there is an organ but no choir. As Instructor of Music his work is largely that of supervision, though he takes some pupils. He has six assistant music masters under him, who teach pianoforte, violin, violoncello, &c. No better testimony to the popularity of a master can be furnished than that supplied by one of his pupils, especially if he be a public school-boy or an "old boy." We are indebted to the kindness of an old and recent Etonian, Mr. Edward J. Dent, of King's College, Cambridge, for supplying, at our request, the following "appreciation" of Dr. Lloyd:—

> Dr. Lloyd's most important work among Eton boys has been to bring good music into their Eton life. He takes a personal interest in every individual boy who learns music, and he has considerably raised the standard of the music performed at school concerts. He also made a practice of giving frequent organ recitals on Sunday evenings, which were always much appreciated. Latterly his example has led to Sir Walter Parratt's giving special organ recitals for Etonians in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, and it is most gratifying to see what a large number of boys habitually undertake this musical pilgrimage.
> As a teacher, Dr. Lloyd was at first very terrifying, as nothing ever escaped him; but his surprise visits to our music lessons were always interesting, because he always had something new to show us—generally a point of phrasing, or, to his organ pupils, some ingenious device of registration. To the latter, his invariable advice was, "If you want to learn how to play the organ, go and listen to Sir Walter." And he was not content with the mere playing of an instrument; he did everything to awaken in us an interest in musical history and musical literature; and having a large library was always pleased to lend anything that we were willing to read. He was also very kind in giving us tickets for concerts at Windsor; and I owe my first experience of a Beethoven symphony to his generosity in taking me up to London to hear the Choral Symphony at a Richter concert.

FIVE O'CLOCK CHAPEL.

The sun is shining brilliantly on this May Sunday afternoon. If the air is not altogether balmy, the breeze gives added dignity to the Royal Standard which proudly floats over Windsor Castle, thus signifying that Queen Victoria, so soon to become an octogenarian, is in residence within those stately walls. But our way is to the Sanctuary—the afternoon service in Eton College Chapel. The organ-loft affords a fine coign of vantage from which to witness the interesting scene below. The boys are quietly assembling in twos and threes. Each boy finds his way to his appointed seat in the Chapel according to the printed bill for the current "school-time." By the hour of service the whole of the 600 boys are met together in the place where prayer is wont to be made. The seventy Collegers are robed in surplices: the Oppidans are clad in usual Eton attire. In addition to the families of the masters, only a few privileged strangers are present. Sometimes a distinguished old Etonian is numbered amongst the great congregation, as on the present occasion, when Lord Rosebery, whose two sons are in the school, may be discovered amongst the worshippers. Dr. Lloyd plays a most delightful extempore voluntary, admirably in keeping with the surroundings of the noble edifice and suited to the occasion. At five o'clock the procession enters from under the organ screen. This is headed by the Sixth Form boys, in single file, walking with "measured tread" and very slowly, in a manner becoming their dignity. The choir immediately follow in pairs. All remain seated until the Head Master at the rear of the procession passes through the gateway, and then everyone rises. While the opening sentences are being intoned by one of the Conducts (corresponding to Minor Canons), various boys are seen to be making their way from different parts of the chapel to the Head Master in his stall and to the Masters "in desk," to whom they hand a document. The uninitiated might perhaps assume that these are specially polite boys who are thoughtfully supplying "The Head" with a copy of the anthem or service! But they are the Præpostors of each division, who are handing in the lists of attendances at this service.

* Festival works.

It is a deeply impressive sight to look down upon that vast congregation of the flower of England's youth. Imagination wings its flight in such thoughts as these. May there not be amongst those many young fellows a future Prime Minister, one upon whom the destinies of this vast Empire may in the future largely depend? Who of them will become ambassadors, philanthropists, statesmen, and noblemen—not in name only, but through whose veins runs the blood of true nobility? Ay! and in the realm of music! Is there a future typical English composer amongst that youthful throng? another Thomas Augustine Arne or a Hubert Parry? Were they not both Eton boys?

But one is aroused from such reveries by the strains of the organ when Dr. Lloyd gives out Goss's fine double chant in E, to which the Psalm for the seventh evening of the month is chanted. The good training of the choir at the hands of Dr. Lloyd soon manifests itself, and a high tribute must be paid to his admirable accompaniments throughout this impressive service. A foretaste of what is to come is furnished by the Gloria to the Psalm, which is heartily sung by that noble 600. The service is Dr. Basil Harwood's melodious Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A flat, and the anthem is drawn from the riches of Dr. Lloyd's predecessor at Gloucester, in that it is S. S. Wesley's familiar, yet ever welcome "Blessed be the God and Father." The unique feature of this service comes at its close—the hymn sung by all the boys, and sung mainly in the lower octave. On this occasion it is a tune they simply revel in — Smart's setting of "Hark! hark! my soul, angelic songs are swelling." It is impossible to describe the thrilling—nay, more, the overwhelming, deep-toned utterance of this mighty unison. This soul-stirring service, at which there is no sermon, is worthily brought to a conclusion by a masterly rendering by Dr. Lloyd of Mozart's Fantasia in F minor.

In conclusion, there is no need to enlarge upon the attractive personality of Dr. Harford Lloyd. Even in this inadequate sketch of his career it has more than once shown itself, and much more may be read "between the lines." Everyone knows that the motto of Eton is Floreat Etona. Everyone—and this includes every Eton boy—who knows the Precentor of Eton will heartily join in saying: Floreat Carolus Harford Lloyd, et hic noster Precentor esto perpetuus!

WESLEYANA.

In complying with the request to contribute some side-lights on the life of Dr. S. S. Wesley, I have pleasure in recording the following personal recollections of my old and distinguished master. This retrospect covers the latter part of his career—his later days at Winchester and the last six years of his life at Gloucester. I have ventured to include one or two incidents connected with his father, Samuel Wesley, with whom my father was intimately connected.

My father, the late organist of Bath Abbey, who held that appointment for fifty-three years, was a pupil of Samuel Wesley, as I was a pupil of his son, Samuel Sebastian Wesley. My father used to speak with great reverence of old Sam Wesley, and declared in many respects he was the most remarkable man he ever knew. He was an excellent Greek scholar, the finest performer, extempore and otherwise, of his day, and as a composer it is astounding that his reputation is not greater. His numerous motets, his Psalm "Confitebor Tibi," and his Cathedral Service in F, besides a quantity of other compositions, show him to have been one of our most learned contrapuntists and scholars in music.

My father used to tell two anecdotes concerning him. On one occasion Sam Wesley played the evening service at some fashionable Episcopal chapel in London. The parson, a popular preacher, and as absent-minded as Wesley himself, was in the habit of letting himself into the chapel by the vestry door just in time to preach, the office being read by an assistant. Now it was the custom for the regular organist to perform a voluntary between the office and the sermon. Sam Wesley took a Gregorian subject as his theme, and worked it in his own inimitable way. The parson came in, put on his gown, and, being very musical, listened attentively (knowing that the great Sam Wesley was playing), and became so entranced in the music that he forgot all about his sermon! He lost himself in a reverie, took off his gown, left the church, and returned home, close by. Upon being asked by his wife why he was so early, he hastily returned to the chapel, let himself in, still heard the sounds of the organ, entered the pulpit, and preached. And yet such was the effect of the music that though the extemporization was greatly prolonged no one in the congregation had noticed that it was of greater length than usual.

Wesley and Crotch had quarrelled. Friends, however, made a reconciliation between them, and, to celebrate the occasion, a dinner was given by Wesley, who also, out of compliment to Crotch, and as a surprise, provided a choir to sing Crotch's motet "Methinks I hear the full celestial choir." The majority of the singers were stationed on the floor of the room, but the "Celestials" were placed upstairs in a small musicians' gallery, they being accompanied by a seraphine, an old-fashioned kind of harmonium. The motet was started delightfully by the choir below. Unfortunately, however, there had been no rehearsal, and the seraphine above was of a different pitch from the harpsichord below. When the "Celestials" entered in a different key the effect may be imagined. The whole company burst into laughter. Crotch, imagining that it was a studied insult to him, left the building in a rage and would not return.

Sam Wesley had a very pretty wit. On the occasion of Sir William Parsons, the Master of the Music, being knighted, S. Wesley remarked: "I suppose it was on the score of his merit, rather than on the merit of his score."

My father and Samuel Sebastian Wesley (to whom I shall hereafter refer as Wesley) were great friends as boys; but upon my father being appointed to Bath they, for some reason, did not meet for many years. When I was about ten years old my father went to open the organ at St. Thomas's Church, Winchester. I remember his returning home with great delight saying that in the streets of Winchester he had met his old friend Wesley. The meeting led to a revived friendship, and from that moment, several times a year, visits were exchanged between Bath and Winchester, and, later on, Gloucester, that continued till the death of Wesley. It was at my father's house that Wesley wrote for his little godson, my brother Ernest (who was afterwards a Magdalen boy, and died some three years ago in America), his delightful tune so well known to children, to the popular words "There is a happy land."

I went on my first visit to Wesley at Winchester when I was twelve. The most apocryphal tales are told as to his eccentricities. I lived with him for some time and do not share in the view. He was moody, often absent-minded, nervous, and irritable; but not more than one would expect from an artist, who is usually not accustomed to hide his feelings. He had a keen sense of sly humour. He carried in very wet weather an enormous gig umbrella of a vivid green colour. Now after my being articled to him, when I was about thirteen, he used to go to the afternoon service at Winchester College, held on Sundays after the Cathedral service. We waited in the ante-chapel until Dr. Moberley had finished his sermon, and then walked up between the boys to the organ, which hung over the sanctuary at the North-East end. He frequently used to make me carry this enormous green gingham through the rows of boys, to my great discomfiture, and I can see the sly twinkle in his eye as he turned round to me when we arrived at our destination at the East end.

The chapel in those days was a delight—wainscoted to a great height in oak, carved sumptuously in a Renaissance style (circa 1650), with seats of the same period arranged North and South in the collegiate fashion, and an old-fashioned "hanging" organ case, designed and carved in the same manner: the effect of the whole was unique. I saw it about three years ago, and was shocked to find the appearance of the fabric much altered and mutilated. The wainscoting, reredos, and fittings were gone; modern benches facing the altar had been introduced; and in lieu of the quaint old organ case, a modern one of a somewhat ordinary and feeble design had been substituted.

The organ, by Green, had, if I remember rightly, three manuals, GG Great and Choir, and Fiddle G Swell, but no pedal pipes! Yet what splendid effects Wesley used to produce from its limited means, and with what dexterity he accompanied such an anthem as "God is our hope" (Greene)! That now almost obsolete art of "score-playing" was certainly exemplified in him. He once told us, on a modern organ part being brought up to him by mistake, that such arrangements were an abomination to him, and that a true musician and artist should scorn to play the vocal score, but, from the figured bass and general disposition of voices, construct an original organ part. This, he said, gave the opportunity for the master; and, he added, "Any fool could perform from one of the modern arrangements of the anthems, they being only intended for novices."

Wesley was an ardent fisherman, and he used to take me with him on these expeditions, which I rather dreaded, as, on failing to catch anything, or such little accidents as getting his line and hook in a tree, he used to rate me as if I were the cause of his misfortunes.

There were two of those clerical musical functionaries called "precentors" at the Cathedral and College. The Cathedral precentor was an unusually zealous officer. In a moment of musical enthusiasm he had written an anthem, "Come unto Me," which composition interested us all very much. This gentleman had the temerity, in the presence of Wesley, to conduct the rehearsals. It was indeed a wonderful sight to see him directing affairs, Wesley grimly standing by his side. I am bound to say the precentor was not a favourite with the Winchester choir. There was a very obstreperous alto at the Cathedral. He had a very high, unnatural voice, and he slightly stuttered. The precentor, after preaching, sent for him one Sunday morning, and said: "Mr. C., I observed with great pain that during the whole of my discourse this morning you were sleeping." The alto indignantly replied: "Mr. Pre- - -centor, I was n- - -ot sleeping, believe me. Would to Heaven I c- - -ould have slept." The interview closed abruptly. I remember this precentor used to unearth music by composers like Porter, Vaughan, and other inane authors, which he insisted upon having performed. When one considers that this kind of relationship existed for many years everywhere, and that cathedral organists—professional musicians of high standing—were liable to be thwarted on every side by such people, one need not be surprised at reading some of Wesley's published views on such matters, as, for instance, his preface to the original edition of "Wesley in E." I think that he took such an "anachronism" too seriously, instead of seeing the somewhat comical side of the relationship as he might well have done. Hence the tinge of bitterness in his remarks is not to be wondered at.

The organist's residence at Winchester was one of four houses built by Charles II. for several of his suite whom the Dean of Winchester protested against receiving in his Deanery, when the Merry Monarch sojourned in Winchester. The particular house referred to was "Nell Gwynne's." It was a most venerable looking structure, oak panels in some of the rooms, and a grand staircase. Kent and Chard, I believe, both lived in it, and in Wesley's time there was an old pianoforte that once belonged to Chard. Dr. Chard must have been a wonderful man if he may be judged by the few manuscript compositions of his in the Choir Books. As compositions they would have been unworthy the youngest pupil in a musical academy, and yet at that time I used to hear old people say: "Ah! Dr. Wesley's music is all very well, but you should have heard Dr. Chard's."

It was while I was living with Wesley at Winchester that he composed and scored for full orchestra his "Ode to Labour," which was performed at the Agricultural Hall, Islington, on October 17, 1864. This work contains his celebrated song, "Silently, silently." While he was writing this the wife of a dignitary next door would play upon the pianoforte. Wesley stood it for some time, but at last his patience being exhausted, an awful message was sent in, which certainly had the desired effect, and he "silently" completed his task. On the occasion of the Prince of Wales's marriage a local committee was formed to conduct patriotic rejoicings in the city, and Wesley was approached with a view to his supplying a new composition for the occasion—£70 was hinted at as the honorarium. The anthem, "Give the King Thy judgments, O God," was written and performed; but I am sorry to say that the £70 was expended on a somewhat third-rate display of fireworks!

Wesley certainly did excellent work at Winchester, and was much respected by the citizens. A few years ago an admirer and former pupil of his, thinking that some memorial ought to be placed to his memory as at Exeter, collected subscriptions for placing a "Brass" in the Cathedral. It is scarcely to be believed, however, that the Chapter intimated that leave would be required to place it in the fabric plus a large fee; consequently the project fell through. A recumbent effigy of Bishop Wilberforce had been previously placed there, and one scarcely imagines that in this instance any fee was demanded. In any case, however, the episode is not a pleasant one to contemplate; for why should Wilberforce be so honoured and not Wesley? At Gloucester, however, a stained glass window has been placed in the Lady Chapel to his memory.

In the year 1863 Dr. Garnier was Dean of Winchester. He was of a great age, and had one peculiarity, a penchant for holding services which were understood to mean his retirement from all public duties—though not from the emoluments attendant upon his stall. I was present on one of these occasions. It was, indeed, a dismal affair—a mournful service, and an anthem by Capel Bond, arranged from Handel, in which the "Dead March" figured as a movement. Dr. Garnier, during the reading of one of the lessons, broke down in the middle and wept copiously. I too was much affected; but finding these proceedings were received with great equanimity by the congregation, and enquiring the cause, I was informed that "these services had occurred before, and had lost their effect."

Miss Marryat resided for a time at Winchester. She was welcomed by all, and lionized as an authoress and the daughter of a popular author. Enthusiasm for this gifted lady was slightly damped shortly afterwards when her new novel appeared, in which all the notables of the city were apparently used by her as material for her characters. It was a kind of imitation of "Barchester Towers." The unkindest cut of all was her allusion to the apparent senility of the dear old Dean. Wesley in this book figured as a kind of cross between a "Machiavelli" and a "Walter Savage Landor."

When I was fourteen Wesley moved to Gloucester. It was stated at the time that the Gloucester Chapter had consulted him as to Amott's successor, when Wesley, to their great surprise, offered himself, and was instantly accepted. Here for some time he was much engaged in getting ready his house, to which a new top storey was being added. His garden, always very untidy, was called in the Close "Wesley's Wilderness." Two dogs, Rob and Gip, were the delight of his life. Rob was his great favourite—"the very apple of his eye"—and he used to accompany us on our long walks. Some three years after our arrival in Gloucester, Rob unfortunately died. I shall never forget his obsequies, which took place at night in "Wesley's Wilderness" under a yew tree. Poor Wesley was quite ill for days after. He had a habit of stopping occasionally in his walks and meditating in a most unexpected way. As the result of an accident many years before in Exeter, he slightly turned in one foot. "Rob" Wesley was so much with his master that he apparently turned in his foot and also stopped to indulge in canine reveries. Rob was an unmusical animal, but Gip, I think, really loved the gentle art. One tune Wesley used to perform especially for Gip's delectation, when his howlings were terrible to listen to; fortunately, any other melody would immediately stop these manifestations.

Wesley used to be dressed by an eminent London tailor, though his appearance would not always have indicated this. I have known him receive boxes full of clothes from London; these he would put by, no more to be worn. I have witnessed his garden at Winchester with an accumulation of garments being aired. I can safely say a small regiment could have been dressed with them. There was, in the choir of Gloucester, a pompous tenor (by trade a tailor), whom Wesley, having had a slight difference with, sought to propitiate by ordering a frock coat. My brother Minton was the ambassador and conducted the whole negotiations. After carrying to and fro many patterns of cloth, one was at last decided upon, and the solemn moment came for the measurements, which unfortunately had to take place in the tailor's shop. Wesley was so dissatisfied with the cut of the garments displayed there that he incontinently fled: the propitiation failed and the negotiations were never resumed.

We used to attend the Three Choir Festivals of course. I remember our going to Hereford the last time the old organ there was rebuilt. It was Wesley's turn to preside at the instrument. One of the authorities came up to him afterwards and said apologetically: "I am afraid, Doctor, that the pneumatics are not quite regulated yet." "Pneumatics!" snorted Wesley; "rheumatics, I should call them."

Wesley had a strong aversion to ordinary musical degrees. It was the custom for one of the University professors to visit the Palace at Gloucester frequently. He was in the habit of sitting up in the loft during service, turning over for the officiating pupil, and giving little subjects for him to work out, and otherwise being very friendly and kind. One of the pupils was a favourite with him, and one day he said very kindly to him: "Mr. H——, I should be pleased for you to present yourself for a Bachelor's degree. I am holding an examination in three months. Will you offer yourself?" Now, as the process then was much shorter than it is now, and the pupil had just set some five-part music, and the professor had invited him, he was all agog for the distinction. He rushed to Wesley in a breathless manner to convey to him the tidings. Wesley nearly ordered him out of the house, and sarcastically talked about his pupils taking such degrees. Mr. H—— plucked up courage to say, "But you, sir, are a Doctor," to which he replied: "I was a candidate for the Chair of Music at Edinburgh. It was then considered advisable for the candidate to be Doctored, and consequently I applied for the degree at Oxford. The affair was purely formal. I wrote an anthem for it which was performed, but I was not examined." He then added: "An ordinary academical degree is not to my fancy. I would have it only conferred upon men of position." He further narrated that one or more of the previous professors had declined to entertain candidates who were neither Cathedral or College organists nor performers or composers of renown. Mrs. Wesley assured me that for many years he refused to use his title, but at last, to prevent confusion between his father's initials and his own, he adopted it.

During his Gloucester period he frequently opened new and important organs throughout the country. I never knew him in his zenith as a solo player, but it was delightful to hear him perform Bach in a somewhat German fashion; but all his solo work paled before his extempore performances. On a certain Sunday afternoon at Gloucester, he was very irritable and certainly tantalized the solo singer in the anthem, so much so that he, Mr. Brandon, stopped, and the anthem was finished without him. The matter was obviously an unfortunate one; but in a short prelude before the sermon Wesley improvised in such a manner that no thought was possible for anything else. I trust in this case I shall not be accused of magnifying a little matter, but my remembrance of it is even now very vivid. The prelude I am sure did not exceed sixty bars; but I have still in my mind a recollection of a series of remarkable syncopations. It resembled in some way a unique and somewhat similar sequential passage in the second movement, "I laid me down and slept," of the Winchester anthem, "Praise the Lord, O my soul," which many think has never been equalled. Another notable example of his extempore playing occurred shortly after. Attwood's anthem "Teach me, O Lord," was performed. The final movement, an extremely florid Fuga, did not go very well; but at the conclusion of the Service, as if to make amends, he took the subject inverted, and performed such a masterly movement as to completely put Attwood's music into the shade and to efface all memories of the misfortunes of the choir. It was, indeed, an exposition of improvisation such as probably we shall never hear again.

Wesley was rather a bon vivant. Everything in the way of food and drink had to be of the very best. He always chose the eatables himself, and if owing to business this personal choice was not possible, woe betide the luckless purveyor if the viands were not quite up to the mark. He was an inordinate tea drinker—morning, noon, and night—especially in the later years of his life; I venture to think his end was accelerated by this habit. He possessed a wonderful recipe for a salad, the virtues of which were incontestable. It was said to have been by the celebrated "Soyer."

Wesley had a love for attending sales and securing bargains. Vainly did we all hide auction announcements from him—he smelt them out, as an African witch doctor does the king's enemies. Consequently the house was full from top to bottom with old furniture, curiosities, &c. In the garrets, I believe, could be found almost any known article of commerce, from an Orrery to a tobacco chopping machine. He loved a bargain, but was tender-hearted withal. I used now and then to assist him in his acquisitions. On one occasion he was much fascinated with a pair of old Worcester vases. He dared not go himself to the shop, as the old dealer knew him. I was therefore the negotiator. Wesley fixed a decided and rigid money limit. After a most exhaustive and Jewlike struggle I triumphed, and brought home the vases in great glee. He received them with delight, said a few encouraging words to me of commendation, and then asked me "did the old man look very poor?" Upon my remarking that I thought there was no great appearance of wealth in his establishment, he petrified me by coolly asking: "How could you have had the heart to beat down such a poor old man?" and then he sent me back with the balance.

There was an officious minor canon in Gloucester, who was of an amiable but meddling disposition. One afternoon after service he came up to Wesley and said: "I think the anthem went very badly to-day. I also consider that it was taken too fast." "Sir," said Wesley, drawing himself up; "I am at the head of my profession; you, Sir, are a nobody. I am amazed at your audacity. Good afternoon, Sir."

To sum up my impressions of my old master, I must say he was refined in his tastes to a degree. He had a knowledge of the best literature of all periods, a love for pictures, and a most excellent judgment in regard to architecture, with an intense love of nature. He was kind-hearted, manly, and courageous, though somewhat Utopian in his views. He would have become eminent in any profession.

During the last few years of his life, Mr. Gladstone was very anxious to confer on Wesley the honour of knighthood. This he would not accept, and, independently of himself, Mrs. Wesley said she could not allow herself to be called "Lady" Wesley. Mr. Gladstone, however, wished him to receive some recognition at the hands of the Government, and so he was placed on the Civil List. At his (Wesley's) death Lord Beaconsfield, unsolicited, offered a continuance of the pension to Mrs. Wesley during her lifetime.

Wesley had the deepest veneration for John Sebastian Bach. He once told me that the "Forty-eight Preludes and Fugues" contained all that was necessary for "Musical Salvation," and that it was "the Alpha and Omega of the art." He aptly named two of the "Forty-eight" as "The Saints in Glory" and "The Kingdom of Heaven being opened to all believers." He also had a great penchant for Louis Spohr. He loved Handel, but, I grieve to say, was not a great admirer of Mendelssohn.

There are two points on which I fear not many of his admirers could agree with him—his views on the tuning and compass of the organ. Strange to say, he advocated unequal temperament tuning to the end of the chapter. One cannot pretend to offer any explanation of such a preference. Certainly in this respect he was not in touch with his idol, John Sebastian Bach. Of all men, Wesley is the last composer who could have afforded to perform his own compositions on an instrument so tuned. Again, how could the works of Bach be performed comfortably on an FF or GG organ? One cannot explain his attitude on two such important points. His arguments on the matter always appeared to me to be insufficient and not altogether worthy of him. I sometimes dared to think (may I be forgiven!) that he did not altogether believe in his own views himself.

It is very interesting to read the articles concerning him written at his death. One of the notices mentions the "European Psalmist," "The Wilderness," "Aurelia," and the "Chant Service" as being his notable works! "The Wilderness" obviously is the most romantic and dramatic modern anthem ever written, but the other three items may not be so considered. The "European Psalmist" was the bane of his life. He had an idea that that overdone and, to a certain degree, uninteresting subject "Psalmody" was a great want in the Anglican Church, and certainly when he started, nearly forty years ago, to edit a collection it might have been so. But he procrastinated so fearfully, year after year, that when the book was completed it had not only become hopelessly old-fashioned and antiquated in form, but nearly all the subscribers had gone to "that bourne from whence no subscribers return." If the valuable time that he spent on Psalmody—and which almost anyone could have done equally well—had been given to original work, what might the music of our Church have not now possessed?

Though he did somewhat pander to the popular taste in "Aurelia"—which I well remember his writing in Winchester, and running up to the drawing-room to play over as an attempt at a popular psalm tune—yet we must not forget that he was the author of that choral, "Hampton," which is indeed a sturdy specimen of Anglican Psalmody. One notice, written in a somewhat elegiac strain, concerning him, said: "The race in this world is 'not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong.'" Still the author of such works—notably his twelve anthems—may be considered by his friends as not to have been altogether an unsuccessful man! Many regard his as the only name to be coupled with that of Henry Purcell in the English school, and possibly they are not far wrong. Considering that he never in any way advertised himself, as is now the custom of so many, we may presume he was successful from a pecuniary point of view, for he always lived in a dignified manner and exercised a most genial hospitality. He had great conceptions of what Church music might be, and often said that only one Cathedral in any way grappled with the subject in a reasonable way. He referred, of course, to St. Paul's. He had visions, I believe, of a "good time coming" for such music. These were not realised in his time, and possibly are still in the "very dim future."

One feels sorry that Wesley did not live to see the "Bride adorned in all her beauty," but I suppose he had consolations in the consideration of his own achievements; in any case, his old pupils and admirers can always remember his many qualities with veneration, and feel the better for having been in any humble way connected with such a personality. He rests in the old burying-place at Exeter. His last words were: "Let me see the sky." One's thoughts turn to his poetic setting of "The darkness is no darkness with Thee, but the night is as clear as the day, the darkness and the light to Thee are both alike."

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

IX.—Critics I have known.

In the April number of this periodical I gave an example of the calling of a musical critic to one of the most difficult and, perhaps, the most ungrateful tasks in journalism. The illustration, as readers may remember, was drawn from my own story, and now I wish to say some words regarding those who received me into their ranks as a comrade; holding out to the new-comer the right hand of fellowship.

By comparison with the army of critics who have sprung up to serve an ever-lengthening list of journals, those of the early sixties were but a little company. It was almost possible to count them on the fingers of one hand. Their numbers were much smaller even than the scanty array of dailies and weeklies within the province of which music had a place. Most of them served more than one journal—a circumstance brought about in part by small pay, in other part by the few pens that were considered good enough for art-work at one time regarded as of no particular importance. I may mention some examples. James W. Davison, as well as being the critic of The Times, regularly contributed to the Pall Mall Gazette and the Saturday Review, besides editing the Musical World. The busy pen of H. Sutherland Edwards served, at one period, the Morning Post; wrote articles on the opera for the Pall Mall Gazette, and in various ways ministered admirably blended humour and information to other journals. For myself, coming in as a new man, and equipped, at any rate, with ambition and industry, I became, before the sixties were out, the greatest pluralist of them all; writing for the Pall Mall Gazette, the Graphic, the Sunday Times, the Musical Standard, the Pictorial Times, and the Musical World. To these were added, in March, 1870, the Daily Telegraph. At that time I was prepared, not unnaturally perhaps, to stand up for such a multiplication of journalistic voices in one individual. Now I do not regard it as healthy. There are various reasons—I shall not discuss them here—why it is better to have many critics, each occupying a small space, than merely a few, each covering a large area. "In the multitude of councillors there is wisdom."

I have referred to the good feeling shown by the critics already in possession towards myself as a new-comer. It is true that I never made the acquaintance of one or two members of that small band. Henry F. Chorley belonged to the exceptions. Chorley stood entirely aloof from his journalistic colleagues. He aimed at being considered a Society man, and may have thought that his status would not be improved by association with the "common or garden" critic. Perhaps he was right. I do not judge him, and he was certainly entitled to select his own acquaintances and friends. So it came about that with the musical writer on the Athenæum I never exchanged a word. For the rest, I bear most of them in grateful remembrance, especially the head and chief, the potent wielder of Jove's thunderbolts; the almost arbiter of musical destiny in this country—James William Davison. Few, perhaps none, of the critics who have arisen since Davison ceased to labour can form any adequate idea of the power exercised by that remarkable man. It was often said at the time that, in respect of music, he held the London press in the hollow of his hand. That was not true, because Chorley, also a power in his way, held aloof in unbending independence, and the allegiance of Charles Lewis Gruneison could not be depended on as a constant quantity. But the statement was only the exaggeration of a truth. Over his colleagues, with the exceptions aforesaid, Davison's influence was commanding. Where he led they followed, more or less closely; doing so with no very definite consciousness of the fact, but submitting to guidance the secret of which lay not only in superior knowledge and literary skill, but also, to a remarkable extent, in personal charm.

It may be imagined that, as a recruit to musical criticism, I perceived a great gulf between myself and the field-marshal commanding in chief. I did not dare to approach him, nor, for some time, did I know him by sight. Making guesses at the personality of colleagues whom I then recognised only in print, I came to the conclusion that the portly person, confident of manner and loud of voice, whom I often saw in concert-rooms—Gruneison, that is to say—was the embodiment of Printing House Square. A greater mistake could not possibly have been made, and I laughed at myself when, as was inevitable, the honour of an introduction to the real Davison came to me. That event, important for one of us, chanced at the Crystal Palace, whither I had gone, with the solicitor-critic for whom I was then "devilling" on the Sunday Times, to hear the first performance of Arthur Sullivan's Symphony in E minor. The year, if I rightly remember, was 1865. Leaving the concert-room when all was over, my companion exclaimed, "There's Davison!" at the same time pointing out a man of middle height and rather spare form, carelessly dressed in black, wearing a hat which had seen service, and generally indicating by his appearance that he wasted no time in the labours of a dandy. I was struck at once by the keen grey eyes, which seemed to sparkle with the humour of a passing thought. The next moment my lawyer-chief was discharging the function which, in this country, legalises acquaintanceship. Davison gave me a searching look, and, for the sake of saying something to an utter stranger, queried, "How did you like the Symphony?" "Well," said I, "it seems to me that the last movement died hard." The eyes were now glittering more brilliantly than ever, and their owner, repeating the words "died hard," burst into a loud laugh. Had I been guilty of a bon mot—an achievement by no means in my line—or did the laugh express derision? Anyhow, our meeting at the Crystal Palace was the beginning of a friendship which endured till the death of the elder man twenty years later.

Naturally some little time elapsed before I learned Davison through and through—before I could read him like a book. But when that consummation had been attained, I knew that, complex and uncertain as were the manifestations of his nature, the man himself was no riddle. Davison may best be described perhaps as the servant of his emotions. These were the determining influence of his life, in a degree approaching to that of femininity, and I believe the fact accounted for much of the personal power he wielded. No man was ever more devoted to those whom he loved for themselves, or admired for their gifts and graces. Against these he would hear nothing; in support of them he would fight to the bitter end. I remember on one occasion that a certain clique of so-called "advanced" musicians, imagining a chance existed of enticing him to their side, invited the powerful critic to meet them at dinner. Probably they knew that he was a convivial soul, and keenly appreciated the attentions of his fellows. Moreover, the moment was favourable, inasmuch as The Times had just spoken in an unusually complacent tone of the school of music they championed. As the dinner went on, the name of the present writer was mentioned, and, I presume, discussed unfavourably, since the clique seemed to consider that in strict justice I should be set down as "a fool." When next I met Davison, he was in a state of blazing indignation. He told me how he had protested against the "malicious lie," and he urged the chastisement which, he declared, I could so easily inflict. I took no notice. It is always better to ignore personal attacks, especially when their stupidity makes it possible for the attackers honestly to believe in them as proper and necessary. Davison, on his part, declared off with his whilom hosts, never advancing a step towards the place where they would have him be. This is but one illustration out of many which proved the staunchness of the critic's nature. He had known and loved Mendelssohn; to touch that composer with hostile intent was, in his eyes, equivalent to laying a hand upon the ark of the covenant. So with others—with Sterndale Bennett, Macfarren, Smart; and, of course, with the greater masters of a previous generation. A French journal once launched a well-aimed shaft at the peculiarity just noticed. The writer declared that whenever a new pianist approached the shore of England, the figure of Davison was seen on the top of the cliff waving him back, while the voice of Davison shouted, "No pianists wanted here; we have Arabella Goddard." If this devotion to persons known and admired be a fault, it is surely one which leans to virtue's side. It may sometimes have stood in the way of absolute justice (I do not know that it did), but, according to St. Paul, there is a quality which adorns human nature more than capacity and will to give every man that which is his due, neither more nor less: "For scarcely for a righteous man will one die, yet peradventure for a good man some would even dare to die." Davison was the good man. If not always logical, he was ever true to those he loved. I remark again that the affectionateness of this man's soul; his absolute devotion to those whom he had accepted as worthy, is the key to his life and character. That it gave him trouble goes without saying. Plenty of enemies were round about his path, watching for a slip, and ready, seeing none, to convict him by inference. But they all failed, as did Costa, Ella, and others, when they sought to convince Delane of Davison's sins, and went away from Printing House Square with a polite assurance that should the editor desire their help in the management of the paper he would ask for it.

I have heard remarks to the effect that Davison was open to a bribe. They are lies. Filthy lucre, as the price of honesty, had no charms for him. His whole nature revolted against the idea, and his righteous indignation blazed fiercely when attempts were made to corrupt him. He kept none of these matters from me, and I know that there were men who sought to lure him with the rustle of bank paper. More, I know their names, and musical society would be very much surprised were I to cite them; which, of course, I shall not do, their owners having passed away. Human nature being what it is, attempts to "nobble" a man in Davison's position were inevitable, especially having regard to the fact that he could make or mar with the influence of a journal at that time well nigh omnipotent. There is no parallel case now, nor can there be, nor is it well that there should be. The responsibility, the danger of temptation incurred by those who wrote for The Times thirty or forty years ago were terrible, and I do not wonder that my old friend felt his post to be an anxious one.

Of Davison as a musical critic, apart from the results of his affectionate temperament, hardly anything but good can be said. In making this statement I do not except the attitude he assumed towards Wagner and the ultra-modern school. How could I, indeed, seeing that, in my humble way, I have followed his example, with, I hope, unswerving fidelity. He was often taunted, as even I have been, with playing the part of drag on the coach of progress. At such times he would laughingly declare that, when going down hill, the safety of a vehicle depends on the drag. Be that as it may, it is well that the public should have time to consider new movements before adopting them, and that strange ideas and practices should pass through the fire of criticism. Herein lies the value of laudatores temporis acti. They may be devil's advocates, but a right to the honour of beatitude or sanctity should be disputed up to the hilt as a reasonable precaution, especially at a time when the public, having attained that dangerous thing, a little knowledge, are peculiarly liable to be deceived. Davison was, at one time, a rapid writer. He would sit out an opera, go to the Albion, or some other hostelry, and produce a column of copy, despatch it to the office, and then prepare to "spend the evening." In those days the police were not so particular as they now are. It was not at all unusual to find the conviviality of the Albion in full flow at two and even three o'clock a.m.; and I remember occasions when the feast of reason did not end till four o'clock, despite the efforts of "William," the head waiter, to clear the place. An interesting company used to gather in the coffee-room night after night. Most of them are dead now. Actors, musicians, littérateurs, journalists—all were represented, often in strong force. But even then the last of the coffee houses (where nobody drank coffee) was threatened. Clubs were beginning to multiply; they continued to multiply; slowly but surely the Albion lost its patrons, and with them its distinction. Davison remained faithful to his old resort till the place passed into new hands and suffered a change which altered its character and brought one stage of its career to an end. I cannot but cherish pleasant recollections of the Albion as it was in the early years of my work as a critic. The art of conversation, then declining generally, was still practised under its roof, and in whatever "box" Davison sat, there the wits would gather and the laugh be loudest. John Oxenford, Shirley Brooks, Tom Taylor, "Johnny" Toole, and many another known to fame kept the game alive. How many criticisms of plays and players, operas and opera singers used to be written in the snug front room opening at the foot of the staircase! We knights of the pen regarded that apartment as our own, and had a stranger looked in about midnight he would have retired before the darts of resentful eyes, Davison, Campbell Clarke, Sutherland Edwards, Desmond Ryan the elder, how many more?—have I seen scattered about that now vanished room, among horse-hair and mahogany, scribbling in silence, and hurry, that which was to inform the world next morning. It seems to me that there was more companionship among critics then than now. But that may be the error of a man who has lost his ancient comrades and does not care to seek others.

Among all of us Davison was, I think, supreme as a writer of English. His sentences, though they ultimately became somewhat obscured by parentheses, were, at their best, as pellucid as a mountain brook; his choice of terms was always happy, sometimes noble and dignified, and the skill with which he wrapped up the unpleasant conclusions of his judgment, or put "between the lines" that which he desired the cognoscenti to understand, has never been equalled in my experience. In his best mood, moreover, he would draw, for illustration, upon the abundant stores of a prodigious memory—stores rich with the spoils of quaint old-world books—and if he could slip in a line of Shelley, or a reference to some obscure event in the pages of Sir Thomas Mallory, he was happy for the rest of the evening. In the last years of his activity the brilliance of his style and the easy confidence of his criticism much abated. He wrote with difficulty, often so revising his MS. as that only a few words of the original remained, and even then, were I present, he would ask me to read the "copy" with a severe eye. One thing he never lost, and that was the "saving grace of humour." His repartee was common knowledge, but only close friends knew the odd or subtle forms which his more intimate humour would take; they only possessed an adequate idea of the extent to which the play of a singularly keen intellect was affected by sensitiveness to all things humorous. His delight in mystifying the readers of the Musical World was absolutely boyish. Some subscribers to that journal may remember an advertisement which appeared for years in its pages, on and off, announcing that the editor desired to sell an old book of legendary lore, the name of which I now forget. The "ad." was always printed in black letter, and as often placed upside down as in the usual position. But its most curious feature was a constantly varying price, sometimes high, at other times low. One week you could obtain the book for a few pounds; the next week, probably, a hundred would not buy it. But the cream of the jest lies in the fact that when the one offer ever made came to hand the volume could not be found. Davison's chuckle over this incident was worth hearing.

Here I must bring these desultory recollections to an end for the present. They will be resumed next month.

Joseph Bennett.

On Friday, the 5th ult., Sir John Stainer gave his terminal lecture in the Sheldonian Theatre on "The Influence of Fashion on the Art of Music," of which we hope to give an authorised report in our next issue. The lecture, in which the subject was treated from various points of view, was attentively listened to by a large audience. The lecturer made no allusion to the fact that this was the last lecture he would deliver as Professor, but after its close a large number of Oxford lovers of music took the opportunity of expressing in the kindest manner their appreciation of the interesting and important work he had done during the ten years he held the post.

On the very day that the Queen was born—May 24, 1819—it so happened that the Philharmonic Society, then six years old, gave a concert. Apart from its interest in connection with so auspicious a Royal natal-day, the programme may be quoted by way of comparison with the schemes of to-day, in order to show the change that has taken place in these eighty years. It should be added that the Philharmonic concerts were then given at the Argyll Rooms, which stood upon the site of the shops now numbered 246, 248, and 250, Regent Street:—

UNDER THE IMMEDIATE PATRONAGE OF
His Royal Highness the Prince Regent.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

Messrs. Weichsel, R. Ashley, Lindley, Dragonetti, Willman, Tully, and Mackintosh.
Overture (MS.)	Woelfl

Leader, Mr. Weichsel. At the Pianoforte, Mr. Griffin.

One feature in this octogenarian programme calls for special comment. The "Settimetto" is our old familiar friend the Septet, which apparently was not performed upon the seven instruments for which it was written. In fact, it appears as if the part for the bassoon was sung by Mackintosh, the chief bassoonist of the day, on the evening of Queen Victoria's birthday—perhaps in honour of the event!—otherwise, how is it possible to account for the "Voce Umana" in the septetic combination? If this question were put to so well-informed a trio as Sir Hubert Parry, Professor Prout, and Mr. W. H. Cummings, we should not be surprised if each one of them would "Voce Umanaly" reply: "I give it up."

The Board of Electors to the Professorship of Music in Oxford consists of the Vice-Chancellor, the two Proctors, the heads of Christchurch, New College, Magdalen, and St. John's, and the two Savilian Professors. Their task of filling up the vacancy caused by the resignation of Sir John Stainer is not likely to be a difficult one, as we understand that Sir Hubert Parry has already signified his intention of standing for the post; and by the time that these pages are in the hands of the reader his election may have taken place. During the ten years of the Professorate of Sir John Stainer, Sir Hubert Parry has been his cordial co-operator as Choragus. Under a statute recently passed, future Professors will be able to nominate the Choragus, and make use of him in the preparation of illustrations to lectures and in other ways, but the Choragus will only hold his post during the will of the Professor, and he will cease to be an ex-officio examiner, though eligible for the duties of examiner on the same conditions as other musical graduates. The office of Corypheus, the elaborate duties of which, as described in the statutes, have never been performed, and the stipend of which is nil, now ceases to exist. The office of Choragus is contemporary with Heather's foundation of the Professorship, but that of Corypheus was only created about 1856, and was for many years in abeyance. It is not generally known that the proper title of the Professor is Heatherian Professor of Music. It seems a pity that the name of the founder of the Chair should no longer be associated with the permanent result of his munificence.

Music was represented at the banquet of the Royal Academy of Arts by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Walter Parratt, and Sir Hubert Parry. In responding to the toast of "Music," proposed in felicitous terms by Sir Edward Poynter, Sir Hubert Parry said :—

It is extremely pleasant to have one's name associated with the art which is the devotion of one's life, especially when it is so delightfully commented upon as it has been by the President of the Royal Academy. It is not the less pleasant to have it associated with that very popular art, the drama, and I can find it in my heart to wish that, considering the representatives of the drama have such immense experience in addressing audiences, it were permitted to the representative who is associated with it to-night to take upon himself the answer for both halves of the toast. But, as that is evidently not to be, the inexperienced apology for a musician must endeavour to take up his parable, and to say something in justification of the main occupation of his life. I suppose it is well that I should try and say something, at the risk of boring you possibly for a moment, upon lines which are not absolutely familiar, though everybody knows the facts, without always taking them to heart. I need not go back as far as—shall we say ?—Henry II. and the English Trouvères. It would be superfluous and, I have no doubt, inappropriate. I am not going to enter on a learned historical dissertation, but my object is to point a moral, and I think that my drift will be very soon appreciated. If I mention the word Agincourt, it is not as any superfluous compliment to the many gallant officers who are present, or simply because Agincourt marks the time, which we delight to think of, when the nation was showing its first talent for organization in coping with the tumultuous forces of mere bravery. It is, I think, a date that we ought to regard and cherish also because of the curious fact that at that moment this country was in possession, the rare possession, of far and away the greatest composer in Europe. Moreover, this is not an isolated connection of events by any means, because if we look on and think of the days, the glorious days, of Elizabeth, when Drake and his companions and the gentleman who bore the familiar name of Hawkins—which was admired and dreaded in those days even as it has been recently (laughter)—were singeing the beard of the King of Spain, we remember that that was the most glorious time in the annals of music in this country. (Cheers.) This country was then producing music which could not be surpassed in the world; it was the noblest, the most untarnished moment in our musical history, for everybody took the greatest interest and joy in the noblest productions. (Cheers.) So we pass on to 1688, no date to be ashamed of, a date when the nation arose and exerted itself in a manner in which I hope nobody will expect it soon to have to be exerted again. At that date the supreme musical composer was Purcell, a man who came at an untoward time, but was one of the greatest geniuses that the world ever saw. (Cheers.) So we pass on to the days of Blenheim and Malplaquet, almost coincident with the splendid enthusiasm which proved this country worthy of the genius of ce célèbre compositeur Anglais, Monsieur Handel, as a distinguished Frenchman recently described him. Those were glorious days too, when we showed how we could appreciate the noblest works of art in the wholesome genius of our dear old friend Haydn. They were the days of Jervis and Duncan, of Trowbridge and Nelson, of Camperdown and the Nile! And so it seems, from the past, that when we are strongest, heartiest, and do the most work we appreciate the noblest minstrelsy. (Cheers.) I take leave to come to modern times, and I should like to ask what is the county which now in England is most thoroughly hearty in its devotion to music, where you can see the real, genuine enthusiasm for the art ? That county is Yorkshire, and I would ask where Yorkshire stands in the cricket championship ? There is no town in the world where more splendid enthusiasm in singing can be found than in the town of Sheffield, and I should like to ask where Sheffield was in football ? I think that one of the most popular of Ex-Prime Ministers and one of the most enlightened members of the Treasury Bench would be able to answer me from ocular evidence. (Laughter.) The moral of this discourse is that when a nation, when a people is worthy of the greatest things in music and has risen to the greatest enthusiasm for it, then it is most healthy, most whole-hearted, and most fit to take the highest place in the world.

By way of peroration the Director of the Royal College of Music observed :—

I am sure you will excuse my taking this opportunity to point out that musical art is not mere "parlour-warbling" and messing about on the pianoforte when one ought to be out of doors, but the real cultivation of and the appreciation of higher things. Such an appreciation is the mark of this country when in its finest condition of healthiness and keenness, and that condition seems to be betokened by the present state of our country. I hope therefore that the end of the Victorian epoch will be no less honoured hereafter on account of its great intellectual development, and keenness for doing things useful to the world, than on account of its establishing and replacing high music in the place it ought to occupy in the national life.

If "parlour-warbling" and "messing about on the pianoforte" are not strictly technical terms, they are very expressive; moreover, are they not too truly descriptive of much that still passes for "music" in this country ?

The advocates of Municipal Opera in London have some ground to go upon, or, to be strictly accurate, they have the promise of some terra firma at the hands of the London County Council. In other words, Sir Alexander Mackenzie and those associated with him are now within sight of a site whereupon to erect a permanent home for opera. It will be remembered that about a year ago an influential deputation of musicians and others waited upon "the powers that be" at Spring Gardens, in order to urge upon them the importance and desirability of a municipal opera house in the greatest city in the world. Their petition, signed by 140 prominent persons, then and there presented has not only been carefully considered, but the whole subject has been thoroughly investigated and discussed by the General Purposes Committee, with the result that they recommended the Council to pass the following resolutions :—

(a) "That the petitioners be informed that the Council has made careful inquiries into the subject matter of their petition."

(b) "That, whilst unable to take action in the erection or subsidy of a permanent opera house, the Council is prepared to consider proposals for reserving a site in connection with one of its central improvements for the purpose of its being used for the encouragement of the art of operatic music."

(c) "That it be referred to the Technical Education Board to report upon the present position of musical education in London, and the best means of affording increased facilities for the encouragement of high-class musical performances in connection with the polytechnics."

These resolutions were carried, nemine contradicente, at the meeting of the Council on the 16th ult. One of the chief obstacles to the full development of the scheme has therefore practically been overcome. Money in London is a possibility, but land even in this vast metropolis is too often an impossibility. The project now awaits the advent of the necessary millionaire who will supply that which the Council are at present unable to offer. With such a fine field (and site) for his opera operations, he should expedite his appearance at this stage of the proceedings. Bis dat, qui cito dat.

The one hundred and sixty-first anniversary festival of the Royal Society of Musicians was held on the 12th ult., at the Whitehall Rooms, Hôtel Métropole. In the absence through indisposition of Lord Battersea, Mr. Walter Macfarren presided. He was supported by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, the Sub-Dean of Her Majesty's Chapels Royal (the Rev. Edgar Sheppard), Mr. F. H. Cowen, Mr. Alberto Randegger, Mr. Oscar Beringer, Mr. John Thomas, Dr. Cooper Key, Mr. W. H. Cummings (Hon. Treasurer), Major-General Meredith Harnett, Mr. J. R. Cooper, Mr. Augustus Littleton, Professor Stanford, Mr. W. Kuhe, Mr. G. H. Betjemann, M. Emile Sauret, Mr. G. D. Rose, and Mr. Stanley Lucas (Secretary). The Chairman, in proposing the toast of "The Queen," said that he assisted at the Coronation of Her Majesty sixty-two years ago as a little Westminster Abbey boy. In urging the claims of the Society, Mr. Macfarren said that though not a member—he was too old to join now—he believed that he would get a £5 note if he were in danger of going into the Workhouse. He appealed on behalf of the Society, and hoped that all would double their subscriptions of previous years. Mr. W. H. Cummings subsequently announced that donations and subscriptions had been promised to the amount of £800. During the evening a telegram was sent to the Queen, who is a Patroness of the institution, congratulating Her Majesty on her approaching eightieth birthday. A reply was received later, and read to the company, as follows: "The Queen thanks you for your kind and loyal congratulations."

A further contribution to "Bugginsiana" has been kindly furnished by a correspondent, Mr. Claude Byron, who sends a programme of the Louth Musical Festival, held on October 18, 19, and 20, 1809. In this document the name of "Master Buggins" appears as one of the "principal performers." The father of the young gentleman may be traced in "Trumpets and Horns: Mr. Hyde and Mr. Buggins"; but whether each of these gentlemen played two instruments, or the trumpeter was Dr. Jekyllised on that occasion, history recordeth not. An interesting feature of this programme is the information that one of the eight stewards of the Festival was the "Reverend George Clayton Tennyson." This clergyman was, of course, the father of the late Poet Laureate. At the date of the Louth music-making, the author of "In Memoriam" was just two months old. We do not hear of a Musical Festival in that Lincolnshire town now-a-days. Can it be that the people of Louth are loth to resuscitate an event which was doubtless attended with great éclat ninety years ago? While on the subject of "Master Buggins," we regret that the name of Mr. John S. Bumpus was omitted to be mentioned as having supplied the Dublin and Italian information, contained on p. 305 of our last issue.

Professor Prout delivered a lecture on "J. L. Dussek" before the London section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, on the 13th ult., in the course of which he expressed regret at the undue neglect into which Dussek's music had fallen in these days. It seems that at one time Dussek was considered by some English musicians to be even a greater composer than Beethoven! In proof thereof the following letter, which appeared in the Supplement to the Musical Library (a continuation of the Harmonicon) in February, 1835, may be quoted:—

Beethoven and Dussek.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL LIBRARY,"

Sir,—I beg to say that I do not at all agree with your correspondent "S. E.," concerning Beethoven's pre-eminence as a pianoforte writer. I am acquainted with the sonatas he mentions, but can find nothing in them at all comparable to the master-pieces of Dussek. The sonata in C minor (Op. 3), by the former, which his admirers vaunt as so masterly a work, is, I must humbly confess, quite unintelligible to me. Not so, however, that really passionate flow of feeling, the Sonate Pathétique, which is indeed lovely, but still does not come up to my beau ideal of perfection. I vastly prefer that of Dussek in the same key, one of the three dedicated to Clementi. Had Dussek written more to please himself, and less for the gratification of an unintelligent public, he would have left all competitors at an immeasurable distance behind him. As we find him, I know of nothing that comes near him in feeling, variety, and science. As writers for the pianoforte, Hummel and Kalkbrenner must, in my opinion, take the precedence of Beethoven. The sonata in F minor (Op. 20) and the concertos in A flat and B minor of the former, with the sonatas in A flat (Op. 40), in A minor (Op. 48), and in F minor (Op. 56), and the concerto in D minor of the latter, are, in my mind, superior to any of Beethoven's writings for the instrument. Your correspondent somewhat rashly asserts, that "It has been said of Dussek's music, that, with all its originality and sweetness, it is liable to clog and pall on the feelings, from its mannerism and want of variety; an objection which is certainly founded on truth, and which may possibly apply in some remote degree to the parallel music of Haydn."

"It has been said"—by whom?—by your correspondent;—and, I should imagine, by no one else; unless, perhaps, by some imaginary assertor, raised up in the writer's mind during the period in which he took so intense an interest in the argument he has advanced. I never before heard of Dussek's "want of variety." Variety and decided originality are the chief features of his works. His invention seems inexhaustible. Perhaps your correspondent may allude to his variations and other minor works; but we estimate a composer by his great, not his smaller compositions. Nevertheless, in the latter, I think he displays much variety, and even in trifles excels every other master.

I esteem your correspondent for his attachment to the writings of so wonderful a man as Beethoven, whose very name should render sacred the most trifling effusions; but in expressing his admiration of one great genius, he should not undervalue another; or in the warmth of argument make assertions that have no real foundation to rest on. If he is not acquainted with the chef d'œuvres of so fine a writer as Dussek, let me respectfully recommend him to study them, and he will be amply requited for all the time and labour he may bestow in obtaining a mastery over them.

I am, yours, &c., &c.,
J. W. D.

This curious and somewhat startling letter written by the late Mr. J. W. Davison, the great musical critic of The Times, speaks for itself. One or two minor points, however, need attention. Davison refers to Beethoven's pianoforte sonata in C minor, "Op. 3." The three sonatas in that key are Op. 10, No. 1, Op. 13, and Op. 111. As he specially commends Op. 13 (the Pathétique), it may reasonably be assumed that the "unintelligible" sonata was Op.

III, though he probably altered his opinion in after years. It is amusing to notice that, in order to glorify his composer, Davison "undervalues" Beethoven at the expense of Dussek; in so doing he adopts the identical measures that he condemns in the methods of "S. E.," the Beethoven man! The works of Dussek had evidently found a warm corner in the heart of "J. W. D." It will be remembered that he wrote the article "Dussek" in Sir George Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians"—that and the notice of Schira being his only contributions to that monumental work.

Kind friends from abroad send us from time to time notices of performances of English compositions in "furrin parts." The latest tidings of that nature come from Essen, where some of the 26,000 employés of the gun-king, Krupp, seem to take relief occasionally from the engrossing occupation of making deadly weapons of war for the Kaiser and others, by making music, or rather having music made for them. It was at the club (Casino) of Herr Krupp's employés that the band of the 159th Regiment of German Infantry recently soothed the gunmakers' savage breasts by discoursing the peaceful sounds of Wallace's "Maritana" Overture, a selection from Sullivan's delightful "Mikado," and a Musette by Morley, said to be founded upon an air by Mary Queen of Scots. One might reasonably have expected that the programme would contain something more bloodthirsty than these dulcet strains—e.g., a "Battle Symphony" with guns obbligato, or a movement in canon.

Mr. A. W. M. Bosville, the indefatigable founder, treasurer, and conductor of the Bridlington Musical Festival, is also his own programme annotator. Like everything else that his hand findeth to do, his annotation operations are mightily well carried out. A characteristic specimen of his method may be quoted from his remarks on Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" (or "Fingal's Cave") Overture. It should be added that, in order to heighten the imagination of the listener, this attractive programme-book is pictorially illustrated, in the present instance, with a view of the famous cave at Staffa. Mr. Bosville says:—

> The overture at first depicts the summer sea on a calm day, then some one turns a handle and the wind howls and the waves roar; rather, it must be admitted, as if they were accustomed to rage "twice daily in the Central Hall" for the benefit of sightseers.
> After the exposition of Mr. Fingal's little melody we are treated to a "war-like Fanfare of the collected blow-instruments swarming round." This is really not so terrible as the German programme writer would lead one to suppose.
> Mendelssohn's bright and sunny nature, and his comparatively easy going life, naturally made him more successful in depicting the summer sea than in reproducing the winter storm. His mission in music was to charm, not to terrify, so one basks in the sunshine, and feels perhaps that it is a good thing that the storm is not so very real after all. A storm is such a nasty damp thing.
> Mendelssohn, the idol of the crinoline age, the butt of this pince-nez-cum-blouse age, will perhaps be more fairly judged by posterity. In the meantime the Hebrides Overture is admittedly one of his most charming compositions. In every Temple of Fame a few niches should surely be reserved for those who charm. There are plenty of tragedies in real life to satisfy those whose itching souls demand the constant attentions of a tame porcupine.

Mr. Bosville may be commended for his timely animadversions upon pince-nez-cum-blouseism and porcupinity.

Lieut. Dan. Godfrey has been arrested! "Where?" and "What has he done?" might well be asked with quivering lip and anxious excitation. The answer to the first question is "the Hub of the Universe," otherwise Boston, U.S.A., the land of free and independent citizens. His offence—"daring to permit his band to play secular music on Sunday"! The said "secular music," be it observed, was a stirring military march, sandwiched between some delightful sacred pieces. The audience were delighted, but the strains proved too much for the ultra-seriousness of an Inspector of Police, who marched off the great British bandmaster to the police station, where he was duly charged and informed that a cell was in readiness for him unless he could find substantial bail for his appearance at the police court on the following (Monday) morning. Twenty dollars gold was the required security, which, however, was soon forthcoming. The law took its relentless course and Lieut. Godfrey, having been duly arraigned before the magistrate, heard the charge read over to him. In reply he explained that he had not the least idea that he was committing an offence against the laws of the country, and that if the magistrate would pardon him this time he would promise "never to do it again." The heart of the judge was softened. He allowed "the prisoner" to leave the court without suffering one day's incarceration in durance vile or even without fining him one cent.

The returns relating to music in elementary schools (i.e., Board and Voluntary schools in receipt of State aid) in England and Wales for the year ending August, 1898, have recently been issued. They will be scanned with some interest by the musicians who a year or two ago concerned themselves in a movement designed to persuade or enforce schools to employ the staff notation. This movement culminated in a strong deputation to the Education Department, which was received without much encouragement by Sir John Gorst. Part of the reply to the deputation was that many large schools in the country did, as a matter of fact, teach the upper standards the staff notation although returned as tonic sol-fa schools, and a promise was made that such schools would in future be specially tabulated. The new return gives this information for the first time. The following are the figures:—

DEPARTMENTS IN WHICH SINGING IS TAUGHT.

Entirely by Staff Notation.	Entirely by Tonic Sol-fa.	T. Sol-fa: Stds. I. to IV. Staff: Stds. V. to VII.	By Ear.
2,461	21,643	883	5,899

The 1897 figures are added in brackets for comparison.

There is reason to doubt whether 883 represents the full number of schools that use both notations. Many teachers who teach the staff prefer to be examined in the sol-fa only. The returns further show that tonic sol-fa still holds the field, and that ear-singing is declining with satisfactory rapidity. The amount paid for ear-singing was £11,893 (compared with £49,939 paid in 1884), and for note-singing, £204,953.

Overheard at the recent London Musical Festival after the repetition of Saint-Saëns's "Rouet d'Omphale" (encored): "Why that piece ends like the one they played before!"

Dr. Hans Richter will be the subject of the biographical sketch in our next issue. A special portrait of the great conductor will form one of the supplements.

THE QUEEN'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY CELEBRATIONS.

(By our Special Correspondent.)

Windsor Castle, the stateliest of "the stately homes of England," has witnessed many a regal ceremony in which pomp and pageantry have prevailed; but on the morning of May 24 those grey walls looked down upon a scene of a very different nature—a scene which had as its chief characteristic, homeliness. It was to celebrate the eightieth birthday of Our Most Gracious Sovereign Lady, Queen Victoria—to serenade her, in fact, on this auspicious morn—that a few hundreds of her millions of subjects were met together in the Great Quadrangle of Windsor Castle. With the exception of a few privileged spectators, including some representatives of the Fourth Estate, the function was of a purely local nature and of pleasant simplicity. The Military Knights of Windsor, resplendent in their scarlet and gold uniforms, furnished a touch of colour to the scene. The Mayor and Corporation of Windsor, clad in their official robes, fitly represented the inhabitants of the Royal Borough. The Eton boys (and their masters) were present in full force, many of them in the uniform of the Eton volunteers, whose band headed the long column of loyal Etonians.

So far the onlookers. What of the active participants — the serenaders and the Serenade? Nothing could be more appropriate than that the musical talent of Windsor and Eton should unite their forces and sing to the Queen on this "four-score years" birthday-morn. Thus the members of the Windsor and Eton Amateur Madrigal and Choral Societies and the choirs of St. George's Chapel and Eton College Chapel performed "a programme of music" admirably befitting the occasion. This representative choral force was under the skilful conductorship of Sir Walter Parratt, Master of the Queen's Musick and organist of St. George's Chapel, Windsor, who wore the robes of a Doctor in Music.

The Serenade began with the National Anthem. The loyalty of the Eton boys here asserted itself spontaneously as they "joined in" on their own initiative. The Jubilee Hymn, written by the late Bishop of Wakefield, with an additional verse written by Mr. A. C. Benson "By command" for the occasion, was next sung to Sir Arthur Sullivan's tune, the Eton boys heartily lending their aid in the fourth verse. One of the "part-songs for singing in the open air" by Mendelssohn, known as "The Woods," followed. To this succeeded the first novelty in the programme—a madrigal entitled "To the Queen," the words by Mr. Frederick W. H. Myers, the music by Mr. Edward Elgar, who was present to hear the first performance of his poetically conceived strains. One of its most expressive portions was the composer's felicitous treatment of the lines:—

> Beyond, beyond their wisdom's bound,
> Thro' fairer realms the Queen shall roam,
> Till soul with soul the Wife hath found
> Her mystic-wedded home.

Another madrigal, which closed the selection, was a setting by Sir Walter Parratt of "The Triumph of Victoria," to words by Mr. T. Herbert Warren, President of Magdalen College, Oxford. This, also sung for the first time, received, as indeed did all the music, an excellent rendering.

All eyes were then directed towards the window of the Oak dining-room, in which Her Majesty had listened to this Serenade by her Windsor subjects. After a moment's pause the Queen appeared. "Helmets off," was the word of command. Everyone uncovered at the call of "Three cheers for the Queen," which was responded to with vociferations as hearty as they were sincere, and which she graciously acknowledged by repeated bows. The Queen, who was observed to be using her opera-glasses and scanning the company in the Quadrangle below, sent for Sir Walter Parratt, and expressed to him her appreciation of the music and the admirable manner in which it had been rendered. "I am much obliged to you," was the observation from her lips which reached the ears of the choir below. Another ringing "three cheers" terminated this beautifully simple, homelike, *un*statelike, and never to be forgotten incident in the long life of good Queen Victoria.

ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL.

The first of the London celebrations was held in St. Paul's Cathedral at the hour of 11 a.m. The ordinary Cathedral choir was supported by an orchestra of thirty performers. "O God, our Help in ages past," by Dr. Isaac Watts, was the processional hymn, sung to the time-honoured tune "St. Ann's," by Dr. Croft. With this exception and that of the National Anthem, all the music was by Handel, the massive diatonic nature of which is so eminently suited to the reverberating interior of the Cathedral. The coronation anthem, "Zadok the Priest," was followed, after a sermon by the Archbishop of Canterbury, by the Dettingen Te Deum, composed by Handel in 1743 to celebrate the battle of Dettingen. The martial character of the music makes this Te Deum (much of which Handel "borrowed" from Urio) very effective and soul-stirring. The service concluded with two verses of the National Anthem, followed by Hesse's variations on the air played by Mr. Charles Macpherson, the sub-organist of the Cathedral, who presided at the organ throughout. Sir George Martin conducted with the success resulting from natural intuition and long experience. To eulogise the singing of the St. Paul's choir would be like gilding refined gold or painting the lily.

THE CHAPEL ROYAL, ST. JAMES'S.

It was here that the Queen was married fifty-nine years ago. The music at the eightieth birthday commemorative service, one hour after noon, was of a very different calibre to that used at the Queen's marriage, thus once more showing the greater attention given to music in these days. The orchestra consisted of the professors and students of Trinity College. The orchestral selections were Handel's "Largo," Sir Alexander Mackenzie's effective Benedictus, and the War March from Mendelssohn's "Athalie." As at St. Paul's, "Zadok the Priest" was sung, and the Te Deum was the ever-popular setting by Henry Smart in F, scored for the occasion. The musical arrangements were in the capable hands of Dr. Creser, organist of the Chapel Royal, who conducted, while Mr. F. G. M. Ogbourne officiated at the organ.

WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

The "venerable fane," in which the Queen was crowned in 1838, was filled to overflowing at the special service held at five o'clock in the afternoon. From the point of view of the organ screen—or, rather, by standing on a thirty-two feet pedal pipe, not in its perpendicular position, be it observed —the sight of the vast congregation in nave, choir, and transepts was very impressive. The Abbey choir was largely augmented for the occasion, and a full orchestra assisted. The singers were seated inside and the players on instruments immediately outside the Sacrarium. Mr. W. G. Alcock, who ably presided at the organ throughout the service, played Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata as the "in" voluntary. After the choir had taken their places, Mr. Edward Elgar's imposing "Imperial March" was played by the band. The National Anthem—by choir, band, organ, and congregation—followed. To this succeeded Mendelssohn's 115th Psalm, sung to its Latin words "Non nobis, Domine." The Te Deum, appropriately enough, was the fine setting by Sir George Martin, composed for the Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's on the memorable occasion of the Diamond Jubilee celebration. It has been proved that Sir George's setting is not a mere pièce d'occasion, but a good piece of downright honest work that will live long after having served its generation. The Old 100th Psalm concluded a service that reflected the greatest credit upon Sir Frederick Bridge, who conducted it with his usual efficiency.

Did space permit reference might be made to the extraordinary development of Church music in the Queen's wonderful reign. But the homely morning Serenade at Windsor and the great public Services at St. Paul's and Westminster Abbey, at each of which celebrations music formed the chief feature, indicated how revered, how deeply loved is the Ruler of this mighty Empire, Queen Victoria—Whom GOD Preserve.

CHURCH AND ORGAN MUSIC.

In the tide of all human affairs the law of ebb and flow prevails. Of late we have all been gratified by the widely increased attention paid to the development of orchestral music; and not the least satisfaction in this connection has been the largely extended employment of instrumental music, and the more general use of orchestral accompaniments in our churches. Such advances were called for in no uncertain tones, but in the belief that all the finest and most perfect forms of sacred art find their true home in the Church. There are, indeed, many signs which go to show that a larger and more artistic development of the instrumental music of the Church is happily likely to abide with us.

Equally gratifying is it to note signs of something like a re-action in regard to increased interest in the cultivation of the higher forms of unaccompanied music. The importance of such a movement it would be difficult to over-estimate. Some points of artistic gain in this connection may well be touched upon.

These are, increased accuracy of both intonation and pronunciation likely to be secured by the practice of unaccompanied vocal music; the acquisition of a more natural, if not an absolutely true "temperament" by the rehearsal of music not under the influence of the fixed tones and equal temperament of the organ. Again, there is an obvious tendency in the cultivation of the best unaccompanied vocal music to create greater interest in perfecting the organisation of our church choirs; as in the desire to secure more evenly balanced parts; moreover, there is a more marked desire for the gathering together of voices of the best available quality, and in the acquirement of a more truly vocal system of phrasing than is readily attainable under the influence of the strongly marked and artificially produced rhythmic impulses of the organ, or of a body of orchestral instruments.

At St. Michael's and All Angels', Sydenham, on the 10th ult., a musical service was held, which included a short but well-arranged section of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," beginning with the recitative, "Man of God," and ending with the chorus, "He, watching over Israel." The organist of the church, Mr. Ernest Foster, played several organ solos.

At Brixton Church the monthly orchestral services continue to be held, conducted by Mr. Douglas Redman, with Mr. Welton Hickin at the organ. Upon a recent occasion the instrumental pieces were two movements from Haydn's Symphony in D ("The Clock") and the first movement of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto.

At Peebles Parish Church a series of recitals recently given by Mr. J. J. Finlay presented, among other pieces, Mendelssohn's Air with Variations in D, now accepted as one of the standard recital pieces, a Sonata in D minor, of three movements, by Bibl, and "Le Carillon" (Wolstenholme). Mr. Henry Riding's programme, at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on the 16th ult., included S. S. Wesley's fine Choral Song and Fugue. Mr. H. C. Perrin has lately given recitals at Warwick, in the Parish Church, on the large organ built by the Hope-Jones Electric Organ Company, and at All Saints' Church, Coventry. His programme included Morceau Symphonique (Guilmant), Reverie (Lemare), Best's effective March for a Church Festival, Pastorale in A (Rheinberger), and March in D (Deshayes). Mr. H. J. Dawson's recital scheme at Eltham Parish Church, on the 18th ult., included "Alleluia" (Dubois) and Boellmann's fine "Suite Gothique."

Mr. Arthur Ingram recently gave an interesting recital in the Church of St. John the Evangelist, Montreal. His selection included organ music by Délibes, Widor, and E. H. Lemare. In connection with the re-opening of the organ in the stately old church at Luton, recitals were given during the first week in May by the organist, Mr. F. Gostelow, Dr. E. H. Turpin, and Mr. H. W. C. Erskine. The programmes included Töpfer's Sonata in D minor, which deserves a better fate than the too general neglect into which it seems to have fallen; Guilmant's "Prière et Berceuse," Gigout's Scherzo in E, Tours's Andante, Saint-Saëns's Fantasia in E flat, and an Allegro from one of Rheinberger's sonatas. It goes without saying that the father of organ music, J. S. Bach, was well represented on each of the several programmes. The Luton organ has been artistically reconstructed and added to by Messrs. Norman and Beard. At Wilmslow Parish Church, on the 7th ult., Mr. R. E. Parker gave a recital, his list of pieces including an Adagio in B flat (A. Alexander) and Guilmant's imposing March based on the initial theme of Handel's chorus "Lift up your heads."

THE OPERA.

The grand opera season at Covent Garden Theatre was opened, on the 8th ult., with Wagner's "Lohengrin." As only well-known operas have since been presented, comment is only necessary concerning the new singers. The first to appear of these was Frau Mottl, who made her début on the opening night as Elsa. She sang sympathetically and acted intelligently, although her movements were too vivacious to be consistent with such a "dreamer of dreams" as the heroine.

The next night a successful début was made by Mdlle. Strakosch, who, however, won acceptance more by the truth and intensity of her acting than by her singing as Santuzza in "Cavalleria Rusticana."

Madame Louise Hamer first appeared on the 9th ult., as Lola in "Cavalleria Rusticana," and played the part intelligently. Miss Macdonald, who personated Nedda in "Pagliacci," on the same date, sang prettily, but her means are more suitable to a smaller house.

Madame Litvinne made her entrance on the 11th ult., in the exacting part of Isolde, to M. Jean de Reszke's Tristan. She proved to have a powerful soprano voice and a commanding style. Her second appearance was on the 13th ult., in the title-rôle of "Aïda," much of which she sang very finely. As Brünnhilde, in "Die Walküre," which was mounted on the 18th ult., Madame Litvinne failed to improve the impression she had previously made, although her embodiment possessed great merits.

Miss Susan Strong made her rentrée, on the 15th ult., as Venus in Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and sustained the part with a seductive and refined grace rarely achieved. Elizabeth was personated for the first time here by Frau Gadski, an artist of gracious presence, gifted with a voice of pure quality which has been highly cultivated. On the 18th ult. she personated Sieglinde in "Die Walküre," but without distinction, saving that she sang well. The conductor of "Tannhäuser" and of the "Die Walküre" was Dr. Muck, from the Imperial Opera House, Berlin. Like most German conductors of to-day, he was inclined to drag the slow portions, particularly in "Tannhäuser"; but with this exception he secured fine readings.

Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan gave a clever interpretation of the title-rôle of Bizet's "Carmen," on the 10th ult., Miss Marie Engle appearing as Michaela and M. Saleza as Don José. Other principal artists who have appeared and sustained their respective reputations are Frau Schumann Heink, Mdlle. Bauermeister, and Messrs. Van Dyck, Dippel, De Lucia, Ancona, Albers, Bispham, Van Rooy, Plançon, and Lemprière Pringle. The operas, other than those by Wagner, have been conducted by Signor Mancinelli and M. Flon.

A very commendable performance (save with regard to stage management) was given, on the 23rd ult., of "Der Fliegende Holländer." Frau Gadski as Senta appreciably deepened the favourable impression she had previously made, and Mr. David Bispham gave a memorable embodiment of the titular part. The other characters were ably sustained by Mdlle. Olitzka and Messrs. Pringle, Dippel, and Schramm. Dr. Muck secured an excellent interpretation of the instrumental portion.

The new stage lighting, entirely by electricity, has conduced to better effects; but the chorus singing and stage management have frequently been faulty, and the raising the prices of the stalls and other parts of the house fifty per cent. for the Wagnerian performances was certainly not justified by the merit of the interpretations.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

MARTUCCI'S SYMPHONY IN D MINOR AND STANFORD'S VARIATIONS ON "DOWN AMONG THE DEAD MEN."

The programme of the concert on the 4th ult. was a model of conciseness and artistic interest. It comprised two overtures, Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille" and that to Spontini's opera "Olympie," a song for Mdlle. Olitzka, and two new orchestral works of important dimension, both of which were conducted by their respective composers. The first of these was Signor Giuseppe Martucci's Symphony in D minor (Op. 75), which was originally produced at a concert given by the Società del Quartetto at Milan, November 28, 1895, and was first performed in London at the students' concert of the Royal College of Music, on March 18, 1898. Signor Martucci was born at Capua, 1856, and after studying at the Naples Conservatoire acquired considerable reputation as a pianist, visiting England in the course of his professional tours. He is now Director of the Bologna Conservatoire, and he and Signor Sgambati are regarded as the two greatest Italian composers of to-day, apart from operatic writers. There is, however, very little that is suggestive of Italian music in Signor Martucci's symphony. Beethoven, Wagner, and Brahms would seem to have dominated the composer's mind as he penned its pages, and only at the end of the slow movement does the grace of the sunny South appear. Signor Martucci's work bears the stamp of earnest purpose and strenuous endeavour. The contrapuntal writing is elaborated with consummate mastery of resource, some of the themes appear to have been born of lofty thoughts, and several passages are striking and impressive. The opening bars compel attention. The Scherzo possesses originality, and the Finale is vigorous, but the effort and the cleverness are too apparent. The listener is always reminded of them, and spontaneity and charm are missing quantities. No qualifications are called for in speaking of Professor Stanford's "Concert Variations for pianoforte and orchestra." The robustness and humour which pervade the good old English tune "Down among the dead men" have manifestly appealed with peculiar sympathy to the genius of the composer, and the treatment of the melody is not only remarkable for the brilliancy of the pianoforte part and the masterful employment of the orchestra, but from the first bar to the last the music bubbles over with exuberant life and exhilarating vivacity. The solo part was admirably rendered by Mr. Leonard Borwick, and at the close composer and pianist received enthusiastic applause. The overtures, conducted by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, were finely interpreted.

The concert on the 18th ult. calls for more than passing comment by reason of its choral excellence. The chief feature was Beethoven's Choral Symphony, for which 200 members of the Leeds Festival Choir had been specially engaged. This magnificent body of Yorkshire voices was first heard in Sir Hubert Parry's noble setting of Milton's Ode "Blest Pair of Sirens," which was splendidly sung, the precision, vigour of attack, and resonant tone of this full-voiced choir being superb. The chorus in the great symphony was no less finely sung—the choral portion being fully worthy of this gigantic creation. The other works performed were the Overture to Méhul's one-act opera "Horatius Cocles," produced in Paris in 1794, and Saint-Saëns's Second Pianoforte Concerto in G minor, with Mdlle. Ella Pancera as soloist. Sir Alexander Mackenzie conducted with accustomed skill.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

Hans Richter, the pioneer of the new German school, we have known and admired for many years—ever, in fact, since he gave splendid Wagner-Raff-Liszt-Brahms concerts to half-empty benches, and a seat in the second or third row in the St. James's Hall gallery could be had for the humble half-crown at any time during a concert. Richter led the public in those days; he set the fashion, and success followed in due course. Now he allows himself to be led, in turn, by the supposed fashion in Russian music, and his programmes are to contain a large proportion of pieces by our Muscovite friends. Let us hope that his, or his agent's, faith in them may not prove fallacious. The specimen presented at his first concert, on the 15th ult., Glinka's "Jota Aragonesa," is hardly the kind of thing to whet the appetite and cause us to ask for more. We prefer to hear Dr. Richter's orchestra employed on such masterpieces as the Overture to "Euryanthe," the "Parsifal" Vorspiel, and the "Siegfried, Idyll," of which on this, as on many previous occasions, perfect performances were given. But it was in Brahms's magnificent Fourth Symphony, and especially in the final Passacaglia, that Richter appeared to tower above all other conductors. He handled this much maligned movement as if to show his faith in the great composer who could conceive such a crushing effort of genius, or to demonstrate before us Londoners the value of a consummate masterpiece of musicianship at a time when the immature and futile babbling of "devout" but inexpressibly dull beginners are being exploited ad nauseam. This Passacaglia has been declared "dead" by certain wiseacres ever since it was "born," and yet it seemed never more alive than on this occasion, when we felt convinced that this great piece of music sets a fitting crown upon all that Brahms accomplished in symphonic music—the great music of a great master, written for all times, and not to suit a passing fashion.

THE LONDON MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

I adopt this name for Mr. Robert Newman's remarkable series of concerts, beginning on the 8th ult. and ending on the 17th ult., with a mild protest. It must be obvious that what is done by a single man in the discharge of his ordinary vocation cannot be ascribed to this huge metropolis. The concerts, to say sooth, were not, and could not be, a London Musical Festival. They should have been called Queen's Hall Musical Festival, or, better still, by the name of their originator. With this initial grumble, I pass on.

It was a big conception that of Mr. Newman—such a conception as, I venture to say, was never formed in the provincial cities which triennially, and in the name of the community, lay themselves out to do something imposing in the same line. Birmingham and Leeds, with all their resources, stop short at six concerts; Mr. Newman gave fourteen. Those ambitious festival towns limit themselves to a single orchestra; Mr. Newman had two, one of them brought all the way from Paris; while to further the success of Leeds and Birmingham, the promoters appeal in the potent name of charity, and employ all sorts of social influence in their favour. Let us, therefore, acknowledge the Napoleonic enterprise of the Queen's Hall manager. Looking at his necessary expenses, he stood to gain little, or to lose much. I am told that he is satisfied with the result, and will try again next year. If I were not a critic, upon whom such Napoleonism lays a heavy load of toil, I should profess myself glad thereof.

The two orchestras were, of course, a necessity. One, however enthusiastic, however "fit," could not have done the work. There might not have been an absolute breakdown, but the performances would have fallen off in energy and intelligence; they would have become mechanical, like the action of a horseman who rides asleep. Having to provide a second band, Mr. Newman could have called in no better than that conducted by M. Lamoureux. The Paris orchestra is known and admired; it inspires confidence, and when that is the case with a musical organisation, victory is half won. Obviously the chorus was a weak point in the scheme, but the Queen's Hall Choral Society is young, and with the young reasonable people are patient. As for the principal singers, they were many, but the character of the work they had to do was not important enough for great distinction. It is ominous for vocalists when, at a big festival, the orchestra deprives them of first place. But that is coming upon us, as surely, if not as quickly, as next Christmas.

The orchestras appeared alternately, and Mr. Henry J. Wood first took the field (Monday, the 8th ult.), with a familiar selection, the chief features of which were Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony; Max Bruch's first Violin Concerto (played by Lady Hallé); Beethoven's Overture to "Coriolan"; and Coleridge-Taylor's Orchestral Ballad in A minor. It is needless to dwell upon what was an ordinary Queen's Hall programme, rendered in a familiar manner, and I save space for that which more requires it.

M. Lamoureux, in the evening of the same day, followed Mr. Wood, the Frenchmen being heard while yet the impression made by their English rivals was fresh in mind. What was the upshot? Simply a conclusion that neither orchestra can equal the other on its own ground. When engaged upon French music, dainty and delicate, piquant and engaging, the Paris band is almost out of sight of the Queen's Hall men. In like manner, Mr. Wood's orchestra runs ahead in compositions of a robust character, as, for example, the Tschaïkowsky Symphony and Coleridge-Taylor's Ballad. The distinction is mainly a matter of national temperament, which, in music, makes for value. We could not alter it if we would; we would not if we could. M. Lamoureux was naturally most successful in Saint-Saëns's "Le Rouet d'Omphale"—a work which, under him, always runs smoothly; in Wagner's "Forest" music, and the Scherzo and Adagio of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony. Not that the performance of "No. 9" was impeccable by any means. Yet it had some splendid points, notably the playing of the recitatives for basses in the opening of the Finale. Than that nothing could possibly have been finer. It was instinct with dramatic spirit, and in point of unity marvellous. The vocalists engaged were not to be outdone on this occasion, if they could help it. All the soloists were efficient, and their names should be mentioned: Miss Lucile Hill, Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Andrew Black. Nor should the chorus pass without praise, considering the arduous nature of the work. The singers were not perfect, but they went beyond what was expected of them in that direction, and shared the honours of the day with their colleagues.

On Tuesday morning, M. Lamoureux was again the man in possession. He produced a work entitled "L'Apprenti Sorcier"—a Scherzo suggested by a Ballad of Goethe, which is itself but a version of an old German wonder-story. What the legend is about, and how far M. Paul Dukas expresses it in his orchestral piece, are matters really not worth discussing. The Scherzo is not likely to trouble England much. If it were merely childish I should say nothing against it, but it is not child-like and it is degenerate—the veriest trifling with an art which should inspire worthier feeling and more lofty aims. But it was wonderfully well played. The matter bad; the manner perfect. Some selections from "Die Meistersinger," Beethoven's Fifth Symphony, and the Overture to "Der Freischütz" made up the programme.

On the evening of Tuesday, Mr. Wood's orchestra had a formidable rival in M. Paderewski, who filled the Hall to the doors. The Polish pianist was generous, inasmuch as he played in two concertos—Beethoven's in E flat and Chopin's in F minor. How he did this the reader can well imagine. For the rest, we had Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, splendidly rendered, Mr. Elgar's "Meditation" from the "Light of Life," performed for the first time in London and well received, the "Nut-cracker" Suite of Tschaïkowsky, and Liszt's Fourth Rhapsody. This concert was a great success for the English orchestra.

Wednesday morning was given up to choral music, Cowen's "Ode to the Passions" and Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens" being preceded by Don Lorenzo Perosi's oratorio "The Transfiguration of Christ"; Mr. George Riseley conducting all three. Room, of course, for the stranger and foreigner, about whom and his claims so many diverse opinions have been given, some exalting to the skies, others lowering into the depths.

It must be clear that in a general article of the present description it is impossible to discuss separately, and in detail, the three sacred works of Perosi, which Mr. Newman had the honour of introducing to England. They have, however, much in common, and by dealing with points of agreement at the outset space will be saved, and my task simplified. But first, let us consider, for a moment, the individuality of the composer—a priest of the Roman Church; a child of her communion; one who has spent his short life within her fold; despite the temptations to come out and reap in the wider field of general musical activity the larger fruits of genius. We should expect such a man to devote himself to sacred music almost, if not quite, exclusively. This Perosi has done. Next, we should expect him, as a Church musician, largely to be influenced by Church forms and modes of expression. That is precisely his state, not a page of his music being free from suggestions of the past in the same branch of art. Lastly, with less certainty perhaps, but with hardly less reason, we should expect to find him, as a young man, revealing the influence of modern usage and principles, and developing a mixed order of musical architecture. In this we are not disappointed. Modern art tends to the rejection of set pieces from the structure of choral works. Perosi illustrates this in oratorios from which airs and choruses (apart from hymns, &c.) are generally lacking. Modern art insists on declamation instead of developed melody, and with declamation of the liturgical order—that is to say, inclining to melodic utterance and abundant cadences—Perosi endows his solo voices. Here, then, we have an oratorio method which, firmly rooted in the past, establishes links with the present. How is that method rooted in the past? In part, as already described, by general agreement with the spirit and form of ancient Church music; in other part by the adoption of features traceable to Bach and some of the older Italian masters, Carissimi in especial. Again, we have modernity in very bold harmonies, showing little concern for effect upon the ear, and in orchestration suggested by the sensuous school to which Gounod belonged. On the other hand, we have antiquity in abundant use of polyphonic writing. The music of Perosi's youth may be described as a blend. So may the music of all youth, in a greater or less degree. For more personal features we must await the result of Perosi's enlarging experience and strengthening artistic judgment. This should be remembered when making an estimate of the priest-composer's value to art. But some do not remember it. They criticise the music of a young man of twenty-six as though it represented the last development of his powers rather than a tentative essay with almost rudimentary means. In taking this line of observation, I am not apologising for Perosi. He needs nothing of that kind. But I am endeavouring to secure for him the just estimate which may be made only from a consideration of determining circumstances—especially of such as are in their nature transitory, and apply only to the present stage.

The "Transfiguration of Christ" suffers, as to its libretto, from the fact that it embraces two diverse and strongly contrasted subjects—the Transfiguration and the miracle of healing the demoniac Youth. It suffers, too, from the other fact, that the "Transfiguration," which would form an imposing climax to the whole, comes first. But the sole alternative was to reject the subject altogether. Perosi could not have meddled with the Bible narrative so far as to transpose its sections, and, in the true spirit of an artist, he undertook the task as it lay before him robed in Scriptural authority, which few, certainly not a priest, would dare defy. The narrative, therefore, stands in its original sequence of events—a sequence which librettists, free to take their own course, would scarcely care to adopt. A few hymns, taken from the Roman service book, are introduced for choral effect and by way of musical effect, but they are not essential to the argument.

Turning to the music, a very notable feature arrests attention—namely, the large space given to orchestral sections in the nature of interludes. Thirty pages (not reckoning parts of pages) out of the ninety-eight in the full score are thus taken up. Here we have, beyond question, a very important feature, although not new, the use of instrumental interludes being common enough in the Roman Church. But Perosi gives them unwonted development, compelling us to enquire whether they are not intended to serve the function which, in the older form of oratorio, is discharged by airs and choruses reflective in character. It is more than probable that, following Perosi's initiative (I do not withdraw the word "initiative" because something of the same kind is found in Raff's "End of the World"), future composers in this branch of art will give the orchestra equal prominence. In that case a momentous step will have been taken. The accompaniment to the vocal parts is chiefly polyphonic, nearly always tender and dignified; often soberly coloured by being confined to strings, or strings with horns, clarinets, and bassoons, but sometimes made imposing by the sonority, and rich with the hues of trombones, trumpets, and cornets. Of the organ, curiously enough, the composer makes very little use, in some cases leaving it out of the score altogether.

In the "Transfiguration" section much use is made of the hymn "Cristo resuscite," as set to a German choral-tune, "Christ ist erstanden." This tune is really the principal melodic feature of the first part, serving alike for voices and orchestra. Other introduced melodies of the same character hold a subordinate place. But in "Cristo resuscite" we have a true representative theme—representative, that is to say, of the fundamental idea of the subject. If it be objected that the music to the "Transfiguration" section does not rise to the glory of the event, it may pertinently be asked, What music could? To express all there is in a subject one must enter into it and comprehend all that it involves. Who can do this in the case of that vision of heavenly majesty which only three of twelve disciples were permitted to see? Consideration of further details cannot now be undertaken; but enough has been said to make plain the leading principles upon which Perosi works, and the methods which those principles necessitate. We are free to reject both, but must admit the sincerity of the master and his steadfast regard for the dignity of his theme. Nothing of truth and propriety is sacrificed to mere effect. If effect comes, well and good, but it must arise from devout treatment of the Scriptural text or not at all.

The oratorio was performed, as to its solo parts, in an adequate manner, and there was little fault to find with the ensemble. It should be understood, however, that Perosi's works received less of justice in this regard than many other things in the week's programme. The shortcoming may be attributed to their unfamiliarity, and, in some degree, to those features in the music which make it look so easy while, as a matter of fact, it is decidedly difficult to render with propriety.

Sir Hubert Parry's setting of Milton's well-known lines appeared to be regarded by both chorus and orchestra as more worthy of their efforts than the music of the Italian priest. But then they knew the one and did not know the other in the same measure of intimacy, which makes a difference. The festival was honoured in being permitted to introduce to Londoners the music written by Mr. Cowen to Thomson's "Ode to the Passions." Undoubtedly the English novelty was the success of the afternoon, for reasons which those who read The Musical Times' report of its production at Leeds last year will readily understand. This is one of Mr. Cowen's strongest works. The poetry seems to have inspired him, and no wonder, looking at its quality. Anyhow, the work went to the hearts of the audience, calling forth what looked exceedingly like genuine enthusiasm. Mr. Cowen has had "ups and downs" in the course of his professional career. This was decidedly one of the "ups" and I congratulate him thereupon.

The evening of Wednesday was given over to M. Lamoureux, who filled it with a capital programme and excellent performances. It was worth the price of a ticket to hear M. Ysaye play Beethoven's Violin Concerto and to see how his brilliant interpretation moved the sympathy of the large audience. With the concerto were associated the Overture to "Oberon," Mozart's Symphony in E flat, two familiar selections from Wagner, and a "Fantaisie Symphonique" (what strange terms are creeping into the vocabulary of music)! M. Chevillard is not unknown to M. Lamoureux's English public, who have, indeed, learned to admire his ability, not least as shown in being very French, and, at the same time, marked by solid qualities. His symphonic fantasia is an engaging work, and I hope soon to hear it again under circumstances admitting a closer examination than is possible now.

A second Perosi oratorio came with Thursday evening, the baton being again in the hand of Mr. George Riseley. But ere turning attention to the undoubted claims of the "Raising of Lazarus," some note must be taken of the morning concert, which, like its immediate predecessor, was entrusted to the French orchestra and its distinguished chief. So familiar were the selections, however, that brief mention will serve. Among them had place the "Egmont" Overture, the wicked "Danse Macabre" of Saint-Saëns, Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor (solo part by M. Pachmann), the "Eroica" Symphony, and the Overture to "Die Meistersinger." These works tested the Parisian orchestra all round, and if the results were not uniform they were in every case remarkable as showing what skill, discipline, and a good leader can do towards making a national orchestra at home in all the realms of music.

Coming now to Perosi, let me first point out that the story of "Lazarus" gave the composer a great advantage by being homogeneous. In the "Transfiguration" there are two narratives connected only by sequence. Here there is but one, running on unbroken to its end, and all the while remaining intensely human and humanly pathetic. I need not stop to show the reader how far this is the case, or to point out the resultant gain to the oratorio as a work of music. Many of the remarks already made in the case of the "Transfiguration" equally apply here. Again airs are absent, and the choruses, other than the choral hymns, are only such as the story necessitates. Again, too, the orchestra holds a prominent place by reason of the interludes which enter so conspicuously into the composer's method. Some of these, under the name of variations, interpose between the verses of the hymns, the theme varied being, of course, the hymn tune. There are a few recurring themes, the chief being one obviously representative of resurrection as victory over death. For the rest, I must speak—while not losing sight of certain harmonic crudities due to the resolution with which polyphony is carried on—of the grave and dignified, yet withal tender, flow of the music, everywhere kept in hand by an uncompromising spirit of restraint inspired by reverence for the sacred story; of the concentrated, because restrained, expression of emotion which touches every sensitive hearer, and of the skill in musical characterisation appearing in the contrasted parts of the gentle Mary and the energetic Martha. These, as it seems to me, are the features which most largely determine the character and value of the work—features which should receive ample consideration when it is possible to write at length. I make no present comparison between the "Transfiguration" and "Lazarus," but when the time comes for such an exercise it may appear that the composer is certainly not less successful when his theme calls for severity of treatment than when, as in the "Resurrection of Christ," it invites display. Mr. Riseley conducted a performance which might have been better, though it was good enough for a fair presentment of the composer's ideas. The solos were adequately rendered by Madame Ella Russell, Miss Ada Crossley, Messrs. Lloyd Chandos, Pierpoint, and Bispham. Some exception must, however, be taken to the Christ of the artist last-named. The "gentle Jesus" cannot be accepted as shouting like a Wagnerian hero. The concert ended with Mr. Percy Pitt's "Hohenlinden," which I was unable to hear, and of which, therefore, I cannot speak.

Friday afternoon was in part devoted to Perosi's "Resurrection of Christ," the latest and the most developed of the priest-musician's oratorios. It would be interesting to know how much significance we may attach to the leaning of this work in the direction of the more general and orthodox standard. As to the fact of such a leaning there can be no doubt. It is shown in the setting back of the orchestra from the independent and conspicuous position given to it in the previous works; in the use of set pieces, such as the duet sung by Mary and Martha, and in fuller employment of the chorus. The question is whether we should regard this as a special treatment conceded to the subject, or as indicating a change due to larger experience and perception. If the latter, then it is obvious that we may expect from Perosi oratorio on a more generally accepted model. The determination of this point cannot fail to be awaited with interest. Of the composer's four works in this class, the last is the most adapted for popularity; but I am not sure that, in a critical estimate, it would come out first. Perosi, to my mind, has not yet mastered the secret of large effects. That secret does not lie in mere accumulation of noise-producing means. Nevertheless, there is much of beauty and power in the "Resurrection." The angelic and other choruses serve their purpose admirably, while the music of the risen Lord everywhere enhances the dignity and mystery of His figure; the tenderness and exquisite humanity of His nature. These general remarks must now suffice, my allotted space having run out nearly to the point of exhaustion. Among the soloists on this occasion were Miss Hilda Wilson, Mr. Lane Wilson, and Mr. Charles Knowles. The last-named, who has won repute in the North, where vigour is appreciated, has yet much to learn and something to get rid of.

With the oratorio were associated two of the three Preludes written by Sir A. C. Mackenzie for a once contemplated production of "Manfred" at the Lyceum. They were fortunate in being a first time played under conditions which favoured perception of their many beauties. It is understood that the entire work will be issued in the form of a Suite, and then will be the time for complete and adequate examination of an obviously important achievement. The composer conducted a very good performance.

Over the remainder of the Festival I must hurry. At Friday evening's concert, M. Lamoureux played another fine selection, including Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the "Siegfried Idyll," and other well-known works; and on Saturday afternoon both orchestras co-operated in the rendering of some very familiar compositions. This was a popular, but hardly an artistic step. If either orchestra suffices for such music in Queen's Hall, then two must represent "wasteful and ridiculous excess." But lovers of noise had a good time. On Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday of the following week other performances by the combined bands were given, and, according to report, not well attended. The public may have become weary.

THE CURTIUS CONCERTS.

We feel inclined to consider the singing of Mr. E. H. Lemare's choir in the "Holy Supper" scene from "Parsifal" the most noteworthy event in the programme of the first of these concerts, given at the Queen's Hall on the 2nd ult. Fine performances of the orchestral portions of this selection from Wagner's opus summum we have had galore, and there have been great singers before Mr. Van Rooy to declaim Wolfram's songs from "Tannhäuser" and Wotan's "Abschied" from "Die Walküre"; but the most difficult choral music in the aforesaid wonderful scene has never been so perfectly sung in London, and what is generally a trying experience on account of bad intonation, general inaccuracy, and lack of reverential feeling, was, on this occasion, turned into pure enjoyment of the rarest kind. For this Mr. Lemare deserves our thanks as much as Mr. Mottl, who secured a superb performance of the instrumental portions. The Overture and Venusberg music (Paris version) from "Tannhäuser" were also most effectively given, though an "invisible" Chorus of Sirens, introduced, no doubt, for the first time in England, was scarcely a success, and Mr. Mottl's tempi were open to objection. Mr. Van Rooy was in magnificent voice, and as Wotan he sang as one inspired. This was indeed "Wotan the god" in distress, and racked with the tenderest feelings of parental grief that could agonize the most human of mortals. It was a great performance of a great scene. Some dances from Gluck's operas, deftly linked together into a suite by Mr. Mottl, delighted the audience by their wonderful tunefulness and rhythmic grace.

At the second concert, given at St. James's Hall on the 10th ult., a hackneyed Wagner selection, played in Mr. Mottl's best style, was varied by Mrs. Mottl's charming singing of Elizabeth's Prayer ("Tannhäuser") and two songs, beautifully scored by Mr. Mottl, by Mozart and Richard Strauss. She had to repeat the delightful "Ständchen" by the latter young master.

CRYSTAL PALACE CONCERTS.

SCHARWENKA'S THIRD PIANOFORTE CONCERTO AND REGINALD STEGGALL'S SECOND ORCHESTRAL SUITE.

Much interest pertained to the concert on April 29, which concluded the forty-third series. Sir Arthur Sullivan's Symphony in E minor, originally produced at the Crystal Palace on March 10, 1866, was revived, under the conductorship of the composer; Herr Xaver Scharwenka played for the first time in England the solo part of his third Pianoforte Concerto in C sharp minor (Op. 80), and the first performance was given of a second Suite for orchestra in E, by Mr. Reginald Steggall. The symphony was very warmly received, the charm of its themes, the clearness of their treatment, and the effective orchestration manifestly appealing to the listeners. It should be mentioned that Sir Arthur Sullivan desires it to be stated that the prefix of "Irish" to his symphony was inserted in the programme book without his knowledge. He merely wished it to be recorded in the analytical notes that he had originally designated his MS. by this title. Herr Scharwenka's third Pianoforte Concerto is in three movements, of which the first is the best. The subject-matter is Slavonic in character, and the development is interesting. The second number is expressive, but want of contrast caused a feeling of monotony. The Finale, in mazurka-like rhythm, is spirited; but too much attention has been devoted to securing brilliant effects, and throughout the work the pianist is too insistent on his presence. Mr. Steggall's Suite for orchestra in E is decidedly interesting. Although the composer has been wisely silent on the source of his inspiration, the music seems to illustrate a definite subject, and consequently stimulates the imagination of the listener, and it thus fulfils one of the greatest purposes of the art.

Mr. Manns's annual benefit took place on the 6th ult. It was pleasant to see a large audience, for assuredly no conductor more deservedly merits public recognition for long and faithful service. The feature of the concert was Beethoven's Choral Symphony, which received a very fine interpretation. The vocal soloists were Madame Ella Russell, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Santley, and the Crystal Palace Choir, which sang with admirable attack and precision. The remainder of the programme consisted of Spohr's "Dramatic" Concerto, the solo part of which was played with exquisite finish and refinement by Lady Hallé, and operatic excerpts contributed by the above-mentioned vocalists.

LONDON CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

CONCERTS.

The London Trio, a newly-formed body, consisting of Madame Amina Goodwin, Herr Werner, and Mr. Whitehouse, gave its first concert, on April 27, at St. James's Hall. The programme included Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat (Op. 97) and Brahms's Trio in C minor, which were fairly well rendered. Songs were contributed by Mr. Douglas Powell.

Mr. W. H. Thorley, who gave an orchestral concert on April 28, at St. James's Hall, is manifestly an imaginative and earnest composer. His abilities were specially shown in a symphonic poem, entitled and based upon Shakespeare's "Macbeth," and, more genially, in an Allegro Symphonique in B flat of a vigorous character. We shall probably hear more of Mr. Thorley.

Miss Louise Lubbock's concert at Steinway Hall, on the 3rd ult., presented some attractive features. Besides playing solos, Miss Nadia Sylva (violin) and Miss Clara Asher (pianoforte) gave with commendable neatness the Theme and Variations from the "Kreutzer" Sonata. Miss Lubbock, a mezzo-soprano, who earned praise for her rendering of Blumenthal's "Sunshine and Rain," was further supported by Madame Belle Cole, Mr. Joseph Reed, and Mr. W. Llewellyn.

The first season of the Curtius Concert Club was concluded at the Princes' Galleries, on the 6th ult., when the music was supplied by Herr and Frau Mottl, assisted by Herr Otto Peiniger. Frau Mottl, accompanied by her husband, sang a comprehensive selection of German Lieder with charming expression, finish, and refinement, and the violin playing of Herr Peiniger provided agreeable variety.

At the Alexandra Palace, on the 6th ult., Mr. George Riseley conducted several choral and orchestral pieces in connection with the visit to the Metropolis of the Bristol Society of Instrumentalists. Although the choral sections were not evenly balanced, the singers gave such an effective rendering of Sullivan's "O gladsome light" that they were compelled to repeat it. The band did well in Haydn's Symphony in D, and for solo vocalists there were Miss Clara Butt and Mr. Charles Copland.

Miss Lily Heale submitted an agreeable programme at her concert at Steinway Hall, on the 8th ult. Her own share included Vaccaj's "Ah! se tu dormi" and "Beloved, it is morn," both of which she sang with considerable taste. Judgment also marked her rendering of duets with Miss Louise Burns. Among others assisting were Mr. Emlyn Jones, Mr. Charles Loder, and Mr. Charles Le Page.

Mr. A. R. Gaul's Norwich cantata "Una" was performed by The Old Tenisonians' Choral Society, at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 9th ult. The soloists were Misses Powell-Smith and Lizzie Teify Davies; Messrs. Harry Gardner and Frederick Ranalow. The accompaniments were played by a string band (leader, Mr. Herbert W. Horton), assisted by a pianoforte (Miss Annie G. Bennett) and a cornet (Mr. C. Ayles). The tuneful work was well rendered, under the direction of Mr. David J. Thomas, and pleased the audience greatly. The second part of the concert was devoted to a miscellaneous selection of songs, part-songs, and instrumental solos.

Herr Elderhorst's chamber concerts were resumed at Steinway Hall on the 10th ult., when an excellent performance of Mozart's String Quartet in D minor was given by Messrs. Elderhorst, Kornfeld, Hobday, and Whitehouse. These were joined in Schumann's Quintet in E flat (Op. 44) by Miss Gertrude Peppercorn, the pianist, who had previously distinguished herself by a finished rendering of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata. Some vocal duets were contributed by the Misses Hilda and Muriel Foster.

The Handel Society performed Schumann's cantata "Paradise and the Peri," at St. James's Hall, on the 16th ult. This work, which is not given so frequently in London as its merits deserve, received a careful interpretation by the chorus and orchestra conducted by Mr. J. S. Liddle. Madame Amy Sherwin effectively sang the music of the Peri, and Miss Edith Leslie, Mr. Francis Harford, and Mr. Whitworth Mitton did justice to the other solo parts.

Amongst the numerous concerts given during the past month the following deserve to be recorded: The Chaplin Trio chamber concerts at Steinway Hall, on April 28 and the 11th ult.; Misses Anna and Louie Lowe's chamber concerts at St. George's Hall, on the 1st and 30th ult.; Miss Maggie Purvis and Miss Minnie Chamberlain's concert, at the Kensington Town Hall, on the 3rd ult. Concerts have also been given at St. James's Hall, by Miss Lilian Devlin, on the 24th ult., and by Miss Osborne Rayner and Miss Gertrude Maxted on the 25th ult.; at Steinway Hall, by the Julian Clifford Concert Party, combined with the Liedertafel Glee Singers, on the 24th ult.; and at the Salle Erard, by Miss Kingston Neale, on the 25th ult.

RECITALS.

Mr. Gregory Hast, formerly the tenor of the Meister Glee Singers, gave an artistic vocal recital, on April 26, when he sang in a most sympathetic and finished manner an attractive selection of high-class songs, amongst which may be specially noticed two charming examples, severally entitled "You'll love me yet," by S. Coleridge-Taylor, and "Roses in a garden," by Norman O'Neill.

M. Vladimir de Pachmann's pianoforte recital, on the 1st ult., at St. James's Hall, was devoted to Chopin, which means that the pianist was heard at his best. More finished and exquisite playing it seems impossible to imagine.

Miss Edith Clegg, a very promising pupil of the Guildhall School of Music, gave a recital on the 1st ult., at the Salle Erard. Miss Clegg is the possessor of a mezzo-soprano voice of rich quality, which has been admirably trained, and the beauty of which is greatly enhanced by dramatic intuition.

Mr. David Bispham has given, during the past month, two song recitals at St. James's Hall. At the first, on the 2nd ult., he sang the entire series of Schubert's "Müllerlieder"—not a happy choice, for the setting lost much of its delicate distinctiveness by the transposition necessary to place them within Mr. Bispham's compass. Amends, however, were subsequently made by a fine rendering, by Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Gregory Hast, and Mr. Bispham, of Madame Liza Lehmann's beautiful song cycle "In a Persian Garden."

Miss Marie Roberts, assisted by Mr. Charles Copland and Mr. Leo Stern (violoncello), gave a vocal recital at Steinway Hall, on the 4th ult. Miss Roberts successfully contributed songs by Bach, Brahms, Fiboni, and others, and with Mr. Copland she sang the duet from Harford Lloyd's "Hero and Leander." Mr. Copland's selection included Coleridge-Taylor's "A Corn Song."

Miss Mabel Phillips, a young English pianist, gave her first recital on the 10th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Miss Phillips is a pupil of Mr. Henry Bird, and her playing of Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 32, No. 2), and several other pieces, testified to excellent training and conscientious and earnest endeavour.

M. Joseph Wieniawski's recital, on the 11th ult., at St. James's Hall, included a cleverly written String Quartet in A minor (Op. 32), from his pen, as well as several pleasing pieces of which he was composer and executant. The quartet was well interpreted by Messrs. Theodore Werner, Inwards, Hobday, and Whitehouse.

Madame Blanche Marchesi's singing at her recital, on the 12th ult., at St. James's Hall, was characterised by the same command of vocal means, dramatic intensity, and variety of tone colour which have secured for her so wide a reputation. An artistic feature of the afternoon was her introduction of Professor Villiers Stanford's musicianly setting of "The Pilgrimage of Kevlaar," which she repeated at her second recital.

Miss Adela Verne, one of our promising young pianists, gave a recital, on the 17th ult., at St. James's Hall. Her programme included Bach's Third Sonata in D minor and Beethoven's Sonata in F minor (Op. 57), both of which were rendered in an expressive and earnest manner.

Madame Josephine Chatterton, who is a professor of the harp at Trinity College (London), gave a successful morning concert at Steinway Hall, on the 18th ult., when she played several harp solos with excellent effect. A feature of the concert was the first performance in England of a "Duo Fantasia" for harp and violoncello, by Zamara, played by the concert-giver and Mr. Ludwig Lebell.

Miss Suzanne Stokvis, a young artist of decided ability who deserves encouragement, gave a recital on the 23rd ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall. Her renderings of a Beethoven sonata and some pianoforte pieces were distinguished by executive facility and musical intelligence, and her singing was tasteful and sympathetic.

In addition to the preceding, Mr. Deszö Kordy gave a violoncello recital at the Salle Erard on April 25; Herr von Dulong and Herr Fritz von Bose a vocal and pianoforte recital, at the Salle Erard, on the 3rd ult.; Miss Katharine Alston and Miss Margaret Pierrepont a vocal and pianoforte recital, at the Steinway Hall, on the 5th ult.; Mr. Claude Newnham a vocal recital, at the Salle Erard, on the 5th ult.; Miss Eleanor King, with Miss Eugenie Fox, a pianoforte and dramatic recital, at Steinway Hall, on the 5th ult.; Mr. Frederic Keel a vocal recital at the same hall, on the 26th ult.; Miss Mabel Phillips a pianoforte recital at the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 10th ult.; Herr Ludwig Strakosch and Mdlle. Marie Bolder a vocal recital, at St. James's Hall, on the 15th ult.; and Miss Tilly Koenen, with Madame Fischer-Sobell, a vocal and pianoforte recital, at St. George's Hall, on the 24th ult.

"THE DREAM OF JUBAL" AT WORCESTER.

The third concert of the Worcestershire Philharmonic Society was given in the Public Hall, Worcester, on the 4th ult. The choral work selected for performance was Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal," which received an excellent rendering, under the baton of Mr. Edward Elgar, the conductor of the Society. The chorus acquitted themselves in a manner that calls for unstinted praise and hearty congratulations. Madame Alice Esty, Mrs. Hugh Fowler, Mr. William Green, and Mr. J. E. Healey were the soloists, and the recitations were given by Mr. Charles Fry. The second part of the programme included Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture, the song "Ah, moon of my delight," from Liza Lehmann's "In a Persian Garden," and the Suite from "Sylvia," by Délibes. A special feature of the miscellaneous section was an admirable performance of Mr. Elgar's "Spanish Serenade," a setting of Longfellow's familiar words "Stars of the summer night," for chorus and orchestra. While the accompaniments to this attractive chorus are characteristically Spanish in character, they are on a much higher plane than the ordinary "local colour." An efficient orchestra of fifty-six performers (of whom a score were ladies) was led by Mr. F. Ward and Mr. G. Street Chignell presided at the organ. The Society, with such a capable chief at the head of its affairs as Mr. Elgar, fully justifies its motto—"Wach' auf!"

THE FEIS CEOIL, DUBLIN.

The Feis Ceoil (Irish Musical Festival), which has become such an important factor in the musical life of Ireland, was held in Dublin, for the third time, from the 15th to the 20th ult.

The competitions, which form the back-bone and raison d'être of the "Feis," lasted the entire week, from early on Monday morning, when the solo competitions were begun, to a late hour on Saturday, when the Festival terminated in a great band contest between the seven premier civilian brass and reed bands in the country. In the evenings three concerts were given in the Royal University, at two of which the various compositions, adjudicated upon by Professor Stanford, were performed, besides several distinctively Irish compositions. At the first concert Mr. Plunket Greene sang Irish songs in his matchless style, as did also Miss Florence Daly, whose reputation as a ballad-singer is very high. A small, but well trained choir sang arrangements of Irish airs by Dr. T. R. G. Jozé, which deserve more than passing notice, "The Irish War Song," words by Edward Walsh, set to a truly magnificent traditional Irish air called "The Merchant's Daughter," being a memorable event of the week. The majestic swell and cadence of the primitive music of Ireland at its best is a perfectly unique quality in folk-music, and the committee of the Feis Ceoil will do well to produce one or two such airs arranged in an equally effective manner at each of their festivals. These specimens might in course of time be collected and subsequently published.

At the second concert the larger prize compositions were performed. Signor Esposito, who is the composer of the Prize String Quartet, was also represented by a short "Poem" for orchestra. Of both works Professor Stanford, the adjudicator, spoke enthusiastically, and the musical public will not hesitate to endorse his opinion. "The Eve of St. John," a cantata by the late Sir Robert P. Stewart, for full band, chorus, and soli, was also performed at the second concert. The school choirs of Mr. Vincent O'Brien and Mr. W. H. Nesbitt were perhaps the most encouraging features of the concert, as the foundation of all music of the people to have the subject properly taught in the national schools. We do not think in any part of the kingdom more successful results could be obtained than from these two schools.

The conductors at the first two concerts were Signor Esposito and Dr. Jozé. Signor Esposito's orchestra played on Thursday night with great success the various pieces for orchestra and the accompaniments in the cantata. The solo singers at the festival were: Mrs. Helen Trust, Miss Agnes Treacy (sopranos); Miss Florence Daly, Miss Bessie McKisack (contraltos); Mr. Reginald Brophy (tenor); Mr. Plunket Greene, Mr. Gordon Cleather, and Mr. Chas. Kelly (basses). The solo instrumentalists were Signor Esposito, Signor Papini, Mr. Delany, Monsieur Grisard, and Herr Bast. Mr. Charles Wilson accompanied the solo singers at the first concert.

In the chief choral competition the Dublin Glee Singers (conductor, Mr. Joseph Seymour) were bracketed with the Belfast Madrigal Society (conductor, Dr. F. Koeller), which latter Society has hitherto obtained the first prize. The adjudicators, Dr. Roland Rogers and Dr. Charles Wood, were greatly pleased with a choir from Newry, co. Down, which won the first prize in the second choral competition. This choir is composed of quite young men and maidens, and nothing could be more charming than the clearness and beauty of their voices. It is remarkable that the conductor of this choir is an amateur, Mr. Maguill, who is a plumber and gasfitter by trade. The church choir competition did not produce any very good results except the performance of the winning choir, conducted by Mr. J. B. Van Craen, of St. Peter's Church, Phibsboro'; but as this is a new feature it may be expected that in future it will be more keenly contested. The competition for full orchestra was also a new feature. Although the prize has been offered each year, it was not until now that any entries have been received. The prize went to the Dublin Instrumental Music Club, conducted by Mr. Robert Dwyer, after a keen contest with the Uladh Orchestra, conducted by Dr. F. Koeller, of Belfast. The judges spoke very highly of both bands.

The adjudicators included Professor Stanford, Dr. Roland Rogers, Dr. Charles Wood, and Dr. Wilson. In the solo competitions one of these gentlemen was associated with a local adjudicator, but in the choral and ensemble competitions only Dr. Rogers and Dr. Wood were the judges.

An interesting lecture was given in the Mansion House, on Monday night, by Mr. C. H. Oldham, on the "History of Musical Effort in Dublin during the Century," at which much interesting information was given. A loan collection of portraits, MSS., early editions of collections of Irish traditional music, and other objects of interest was held in the Hall of the National Library. For the latter a catalogue was compiled by Mr. D. J. O'Donoghue, which will be of permanent interest, as it is practically the first attempt at a complete bibliography of the subject.

In conclusion, the Feis Ceoil has clearly taken a very great step forward this year. The interest in the competitions is much greater, and the general support and enthusiasm most encouraging. It has been carefully steered through many quicksands and shoals of danger, and the most critical period of its existence is now passed. It has become an annual event of very great importance, and there can be no doubt but that the interest in it is permanent and increasing.

RICHMOND PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

What would musical England do without Sir Hubert Parry? He travels hither and thither to conduct performances of his works, and wherever he goes his breezy good nature, exuberant spirits, wholesome enthusiasm and infectious optimism go with him and produce an exhilarating effect upon executants and, to a certain extent, audiences, from which there is no escaping. It was royal Richmond's turn, on April 27, to honour him at a festival concert at the Star and Garter Hotel. The programme, devoted exclusively to Sir Hubert's compositions, comprised the Suite from his music to "Hypatia," "The Lotos Eaters," the "English" Symphony (No. 3), the part-song, "There rolls the deep," a song, "Where shall the lover rest?" and "Blest Pair of Sirens"—an excellent and varied selection. The Richmond Philharmonic Society (conductor, and on this occasion leader, Mr. James Brown) cannot yet boast of a first-rate chorus, nor is its (largely amateur) orchestra equal to all the tasks that such a Parry programme as the above imposes upon them. Any shortcomings can, however, be forgiven in view of right goodwill shown by all, and the capital work of the strings, who followed both conductor and leader with intelligence and enthusiasm. Amongst the successes of the evening were the vigorous "Street Scene" and the entr'acte (Ruth and Orestes) from "Hypatia," the latter a beautiful piece of love music; the impassioned and moving Andante and the delightful Scherzo in the Symphony. The cantata—one of the most imaginative and romantic of the long series of the composer's choral works—made a deep impression, the greatest effect being created by Miss Agnes Nicholls, who sang the soprano solos with a beautiful voice, a pure style and thorough appreciation of both the poet's glowing lines and the composer's expressive strains. Miss Nicholls scored another success in the dramatic setting of Scott's "Where shall the lover rest?" which Sir Hubert had very effectively scored for this occasion. A sonorous performance of "Blest Pair of Sirens" brought an enjoyable concert to a stirring and inspiriting close. In the interval the hero of the evening was addressed in the artists' room, coram chorus and orchestra, by the Society's president, Mr. Clifford Edgar, Mayor of Windsor—who, by the way, is also a Bachelor in Music. In a few well chosen words he dwelt on Sir Hubert's services to our art and the pleasure which the Society had experienced in seeing him in their midst. As a slight memento of the occasion they presented their guest with a gold-mounted cigar case. Sir Hubert's reply was neither formal nor formidable, but his friendly words of thanks gave the utmost pleasure.

MUSIC COMPETITIONS.

MORECAMBE.

Morecambe held its ninth annual musical festival and competition on April 26, 27, 28, and 29. To many people it may seem strange that a festival of real importance in its way should be held at this popular seaside resort, especially as the dates are always fixed so much in advance of the regular season. But it has been found to be a distinct advantage to local musical organisations, as well as to many interested persons from distant places, to cap their winter practice by a contest in the spring, and to avail themselves of the splendid accommodation afforded by the fine music hall of the Winter Gardens at Morecambe. The festival has now grown in such an extraordinary degree that it may justly claim to be the premier competition in the North of England. It is admirably and sensibly managed. Local societies have their special sections and the best choirs in the North of England are attracted on the opening day. On the present occasion the festival was spread over four days. April 26 was exclusively devoted to the children, who competed in sight reading, solos, action songs, village school choirs, and other children's choirs. A performance of Jacobi's operetta "Cinderella," and of the new humorous cantata for children, "The Frogs and the Ox" (Shapcott Wensley and Frederick Bridge), formed part of the proceedings. The latter work was admirably sung by about 250 children, under the personal direction of the composer, and was received with much favour.

On April 27 Sir Frederick Bridge, who adjudicated at most of the competitions throughout the festival, gave his lecture on "Pepys' Diary and its Musical Notes." Great interest was manifested in the lecturer's treatment of this topic, and the illustrations, sung by Miss Panton and Mr. Dawson, and played on the flute by M. de Jong, were greatly appreciated. On the 28th the competitions were resumed. There were sixty-seven entries in the various classes for choirs, instrumental trios and quartets, solo singing, and choral sight reading. Crosscrake gained the first prize in one section, the Barrow Ladies' Choir in another, and Skerton in another. But the greatest interest was reserved for the 29th, when choirs from any distance were allowed to enter. On this final day Sir Frederick Bridge and Dr. McNaught adjudicated together. The entries were numerous and the quality of the performances was extraordinarily good. In the female-voice choir class the Blackpool Ladies' Choir came first. They gave a beautiful performance of the test piece, a four-part song, "Some strain that once," by Marie Wurm, the Barrow Ladies' Choir coming close behind. The Furness String Orchestra gained the prize in the third section. The test piece was the Waltz from the Serenade (Op. 48) by Tschaïkowsky. The full orchestras had to play Schubert's Overture to "Rosamunde." There were four entries, and the first place was taken by the Colne Orchestral Society, the New Church School orchestra, from Accrington, being a good second. Many excellent choirs competed in the male-voice section. The tests were, "I wish to tune" (S. S. Wesley), a piece full of difficulties and withal very long, and the humorous part-song "Bold Turpin" (Sir Frederick Bridge). After a close and exciting contest the Manchester Orpheus Prize Glee Society was placed first, the Morley Vocal Union and the Nelson Aria Prize Glee Union following close behind. In the open mixed-voice choir section there were six competitors. The test pieces were, "Charm me asleep" (Leslie), "Come, pretty wag" (Sir Hubert Parry), and "There is dew" (Eaton Faning). Each choir sang two of these pieces in the afternoon, and four were selected to sing the third piece at the evening meeting. The four selected were the Blackburn Contest Choir, the Morecambe Madrigal Society, the Blackpool Prize Choir, and the famous Saltaire Wesleyan Prize Choir. It was the opinion of both the experienced adjudicators that the performance of these four choirs was almost faultless. It is hard to imagine anything in the way of part-singing more perfect as to blend, beauty of tone, dainty rhythm, and expression than was heard on this occasion. It was exceedingly difficult to single out one choir as better than the other, but in the end they were placed in the order named above. At this evening competition the magnificent hall was crowded with an audience of between four and five thousand people, all of whom were keenly interested in the result. An interesting feature in the evening programme was the performance, for the first time, by the combined choirs, of the madrigal "Weep no more, woeful shepherd," written specially for the occasion by Sir Frederick Bridge and conducted by the composer. Mr. C. H. Fogg was an able accompanist throughout the competitions and concerts, and Madame Sadler Fogg was an acceptable soloist. The whole organisation of the festival, in which about 2,000 individuals took an active part, reflects great credit on the committee of management. The greatest doubter of the value of competitions could hardly fail to be converted when brought face to face with the splendid results achieved at Morecambe. A generous acknowledgment is due to Mr. J. L. Aldous, a local music professor, who, as honorary secretary, has laboured unreservedly and ably for the success of the scheme. It will be a matter of regret to a large circle to learn that the committee do not see their way to retain Mr. Aldous's services for the future. His successor will certainly have a difficult task. We are glad to learn that the financial success of the festival resulted in a profit of £50, which was distributed amongst some of the poorer choirs towards defraying the cost of their expenses.

CARLISLE.

The music competitions held under the head of the "Carlisle and District Musical Festival" took place on April 27 and 28, in the large Drill Hall. A strong committee, under the presidency of the Lord Bishop of Carlisle and including names of the best known residents of social position and influence in the district, has succeeded in making this gathering one of the most important of its kind held in the North of England. The competitions are open to the whole of Cumberland, and to any towns and villages within a radius of thirty miles from Carlisle. About 800 competitors entered in the fourteen vocal and instrumental divisions. The choral classes were thoughtfully divided into many sections so as to avoid, as far as possible, pitting choirs of different constitution and aims against one another. Choirs were classified as follows:—(a) girls' clubs, (b) church or chapel choirs (mixed voices or men and boys), (c) rural church choirs, (d) choral societies, (e) choral societies from small places (the music for S.S.B. only), (f) female-voice choirs, (g) men's voice choirs, and (h) junior choirs in three sub-sections. Besides all these sections, there were classes for string quartets, pianoforte and string trios, and for sight singing. Most of the choral performances reached a high standard. As the adjudicator, Dr. McNaught, remarked, it was evident not only that there was ample good material in the choirs, but that teachers and conductors had proved themselves enthusiastic and highly capable. Good tune and tone, refinement of expression, and clear enunciation were common features of the singing. Thirty-nine choirs, nine vocal quartet parties, two string quartets, and three instrumental trio parties had entered the various classes. In the chief choral class for choir and choral societies, the test pieces for which were "With drooping wings" (Purcell) and "Come away, sweet love" (Rathbone)—the latter a very taking piece in the light madrigal style—the Charlotte Street (Carlisle) Choir, under Mr. J. T. Dowell, came first, and the Annan Choir, under Miss Meikle, came second. Both choirs sang with excellent tone and charming finish. Greystoke, under Lady Mabel Howard, came first in three other sections. On the junior day fourteen children's choirs competed. The best results were obtained by the Caldewgate Board boys, under Mr. A. Smith; the Holy Trinity boys, under Mr. J. Thompson; and the Penrith Board girls, under Miss J. Lewens. The Penrith children especially distinguished themselves in the two-part and three-part sight reading.

A concert was given by the juniors at the close of the competition. The children, to the number of about 350, sang some good school music, one of the most successful pieces being an action song, "The Wasp" (T. Facer). A string band also played Cowen's Dances and furnished accompaniments. Miss Helen Egerton, of the Royal College of Music, played violin solos and was much appreciated. Miss Goodwin conducted. Another concert was given by the adult competitors on the evening of April 27. The programme included "Spring's Message" (Gade), sung by the combined choirs, assisted by the Carlisle Orchestral Union, a competent body of performers. Dr. McNaught conducted. The band also performed separately, under their own conductor, Mr. H. Henderson. The Lady Sybil Vivian Smith sang at both concerts. She has a voice of beautiful quality and sings with excellent style. Mr. John Browning, of Leeds, also sang some solos to the great satisfaction of the large audience. At both the concerts, and throughout the competition, Miss A. J. Boyd was a thoroughly efficient accompanist. The committee must have felt thoroughly satisfied with the excellent results of their labours. The stimulus of the competitions had been felt far and wide, and had brought many choirs into existence. Mr. D. Hodgson fully maintained the reputation he has gained as a vigilant and active secretary.

AN EISTEDDFOD IN AUSTRALIA.

It will be of interest to Welshmen to know that residents in the Australian Colonies, hailing directly or indirectly from the Principality, have for some years annually held their national festival in the various Colonies—chief amongst the Austral group comes New South Wales and Queensland. If the Eisteddfod has taken root in South Australia and Victoria, it has not flourished with anything like the same luxuriance as in the sister states. Every year, about Christmastide, both in Newcastle and Wallsend—the two great New South Wales mining centres—we find four or five choirs, of over 100 voices each, competing for a large money prize, and singing the great Handelian or Mendelssohnian choruses with almost unfailing accuracy, whilst violin, pianoforte, and vocal solos are quite as keenly contested and perhaps with just as much individual ability as is collectively shown in the choral numbers.

Queensland (its capital of Brisbane is nearly 800 miles from Sydney, the N.S.W. metropolis) generally celebrates the Eisteddfod about Eastertide. This year the chief meeting was at Ipswich, a beautifully situated town a few miles from Brisbane. Competitors came from all parts of the country, and three large choirs, varying in numbers from 80 to 120, travelled long distances by the railway to the scene of competition. The meetings were presided over by His Honour the Chief Justice (Sir S. Griffiths), and subsequently by Mr. Lewis Thomas, who is familiarly known as "The Coal King." There could not have been less than 2,000 persons present. The musical adjudicator was Mr. Henry John King, who had been brought from Melbourne, a distance of 1,400 miles, for the occasion! Mr. King's name is known as a composer of anthems and church services. In addition to the value of his opinion on music, Mr. King is also a successful public speaker, and his judgments are listened to with much interest. The annual prize for the chief choral competition is £50. It is always furnished by Mr. Lewis Thomas, together with a second prize of £20. The programme is compiled from the works of the great masters, and includes choruses for mixed choirs and part-songs for men's voices. It is hardly necessary to say that the proceedings are marked with much enthusiasm.

THE TONIC SOL-FA COLLEGE.

Abundant testimony to the excellent work accomplished by this Institution was forthcoming on the 15th ult., at the annual meeting at Queen's Hall, under the presidency of Sir Richard Temple. The speakers included Mr. Alfred Thomas, M.P., who claimed that the Welsh choirs had attained their present state of efficiency by means of the tonic sol-fa system, and an interesting feature of the proceedings was the presentation, by Lady Betty Balfour, of silver medals (given by Mr. J. Spencer Curwen, the president of the College) to several pioneers of the movement. During the twenty-four years of its existence the College has issued 641,459 certificates to pupils examined, and of this total no less than 24,205 were given in the past year.

The South London Choral Association (conductor, Mr. L. C. Venables) and the Temperance Choral Society (conductor, Mr. Frederick Williams) each sang several pieces with creditable spirit and observance of expression. United they steadily rendered "All men, all things" ("Hymn of Praise"), Gounod's "Gallia" (solo part by Miss Maude Ballard), the "Hailstone" chorus from "Israel in Egypt," and the "Hallelujah" chorus from "The Messiah." A juvenile choir from the Kilburn Lane Board School attended to give illustrations of the method of teaching and to sing some part-songs, under the conductorship of Mr. W. T. Oke.

HARMONY IN THE ANCIENT EASTERN WORLD.

Acceding to the request of the authorities of Trinity College, London, Dr. Henry Hiles undertook to deliver in Mandeville Place, on the 8th and 9th ult., the addresses known as the "Queen Victoria lectures," founded as an annual commemoration of the long and happy reign of Her Majesty.

Contending that, among many subjects which still are suffered, needlessly, to perplex students, there are some which require to be examined by the light of a little common sense only, the lecturer claimed that these commemorative discourses might be (at least occasionally) devoted to the solving of historic difficulties. Selecting a subject which, certainly, has not met with the attention it deserves, Dr. Hiles divided the history of musical knowledge into three great dispensations—the first and third, full of vitality and progress; the second, barren and unfruitful. In the outline of one of our classified forms of composition—the Rondo—he traced an epitome of the three revelations—of the primeval dawn of our art; of a central episode of entire divergence from a straight line of progress; and of the European re-dawn of song and minstrelsy, wherein an entirely new birth gave fresh and healthy life.

Restricting, however, his detailed survey to an examination of the first of the three great epochs, Dr. Hiles showed how, before the invention of arbitrary words, emotion and passionate feeling would be naturally expressed by mere modifications of vocal tone; how instinctively the rudest peasant would learn the advantage of a sustained pitch when he called to his distant mate across a stream or on an opposite hill-side; how soon such sustained sounds would be classified as harmonious or discordant, their pitch being changed and steadied easily or only with difficulty; and how a sense of their agreement or consonance would inevitably be gained. The vina of Hindostan; the huge dulcimer of China with its two players plucking strings of different lengths; the tscheng with its wind reservoir, hollow pipes, and free reeds; the royal harp and the twin pipes of the Nile-land were all examined, as showing the possession of a knowledge of harmony in very remote ages, an evidence confirmed by the obvious fact that the first sequence of sounds of which we have any positive information was distinctly based upon the consonance of a major —if not, also, of a minor—triad. The history of the five-note scale, to which the Chinese added their "leaders," was followed until Pythagoras found it in Egypt and carried it back with him to Greece, where his countrymen occupied themselves—like so many children—in dissecting the new toy instead of utilizing it. As a lecturer Dr. Hiles has hitherto been noted chiefly as a radical and fearless reformer. He has now shown himself as a hearty reverer of ancient learning—but of a true and not a pseudo-antiquity. We understand that the two lectures are being published; and we doubt not they will receive the attention they deserve.

THE SCOPE OF PROGRAMME MUSIC.

At the meeting of the Musical Association on the 9th ult., at the Royal College of Organists, Mr. William Wallace read a paper on "The Scope of Programme Music," and delivered a discourse that will certainly add to the value of the yearly volume of Proceedings when it appears.

At the outset of his remarks Mr. Wallace pointed out that it was not uncommon to find musicians who, while proclaiming the supremacy of absolute music, saw no beauty in absolute painting and sculpture, and admired the most flagrant instances of a programme in these arts. There was no doubt that at the present time programme music had attained such an importance that it could not be passed by as a means of musical expression unworthy of employment.

A philosophic definition of programme music might be stated as "music which attempts to excite a mental image by means of an auditory impression." This might be sub-divided into three clauses—(1) music which attempted to symbolize sounds not primarily produced by musical instruments; (2) music which attempted to symbolize in sound visual impressions, such as the flight of birds, the tranquillity of nature—these being objective and suggesting rhythm; (3) music which attempted to symbolize in sound ideas that were entirely subjective and appealed to the intellect, such as love or revenge—all the emotions, in fact. These last were of infinitely greater value musically than the others.

An ingenious plea for composers revealing the source of their inspiration was that by so doing they prevented imaginative writers of analytical programmes from saddling their works with some preposterous story. In all music, whether programme or absolute, there was the difficulty of arriving at the composer's meaning. If he worked closely to a literary theme, he had to assume that his audience possessed an acquaintance with his subject equal to his own. "The writer of absolute music ran the same risk of not being understood. The psychology of listening to music was a question as wide as the psychology of composing. There were examples of programme music so strict in their ideas that an explanation seemed unnecessary, while at the same time the structure was so apparent and based upon so logical a plan that they might rank as absolute music.

An ideal conception in music would stand high, whether it were founded on a poetic idea which belongs to all the world or sprang spontaneously from the composer's imagination, and although the way in which he might state his theme was peculiarly his own, it was absurd to contend that his habit of thought had withstood every outward influence, whether in experience or in the contemplation of phases of life. But if he chose to veil his inner thoughts and gave them to us in the language of music, we were bound to respect his reticence, just as, when he declared the emotional basis of his music, we are bound to accept it from his, not our own point of view.

In conclusion, the lecturer said: "All music was at one time purely objective. Eliminate certain concrete features and work entirely upon imaginative ideas and it becomes subjective. Between this and absolute music there is little to choose, except that the composer declares or withholds his primary idea, or the emotion which he felt on entering upon or subsequent to the accomplishment of his work."

REVIEWS.

The Musician's Pilgrimage: a Study in Artistic Development. By J. A. Fuller Maitland.
[Smith, Elder and Company.]

Mr. Fuller Maitland has produced a thoughtfully written book and one that calls for attentive consideration. It is not only the outcome of a cultured mind, but it bears strong evidence of the author's keen power of observation. The title of the book is, perhaps, a little misleading. Mr. Maitland's "musician" is to all intents and purposes the public performer, and the concert-platform is the scene of his pilgrimage—in other words, it is the career of the executant musician, not the teacher or composer, that is treated of in these pages. Mr. Maitland, it is true, claims that similar conclusions may in some degree be arrived at in regard to the growth of a composer, but opinions will differ in regard to this deduction. The musicians pilgrimage is here divided into the following seven stages—the prodigy, the student, the prig, the amateur, the virtuoso, the artist, and the veteran. In each of these chapters the reader will find some words of wisdom of a very potent nature, even though he may not always find himself in full agreement with Mr. Maitland's theories. We must be content with one extract as a specimen of his reasoning. On the subject of journalistic criticism of students' performances he very sensibly says: "The conscientious critic will naturally attend such performances in a slightly different spirit from that in which he listens to finished artists. He will refer the young people's efforts to a lower standard than would be required at what may be called a grown-up concert. He himself will be fully conscious of the difference, but it is unlikely that he will be able to keep it constantly before his readers' minds. Such phrases as 'very good for a student' cannot be repeated throughout an article, but unless they are repeated the friends of the student whose attempts are commended will inevitably foster the absurd delusion that because a commonplace expression of approval is bestowed the student is therefore the equal of some public performer who, it may be, is criticised in the same phrase."

"To help, if it be possible, some of those who are on their way to become artists" has been Mr. Maitland's object in writing this book. Musicians, as a rule, are so self-centred in their narrow "four-in-a-barisms" that they have not much of a reputation for taking an interest in the literature of their art. It is, therefore, impossible to estimate what will be the practical effect of this effort on the part of the musical critic of The Times; but of his earnest endeavour to promote the cause he has so much at heart there can be no reasonable doubt.

Fifty Vocalises. For two voices. By Auguste Panseron. Edited by Alberto Randegger. Part I.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Auguste Panseron, who lived from 1796 to 1859, was one of the famed Parisian teachers of his time, and his vocal exercises were so highly esteemed that they were adopted by Cherubini for the singing classes in the Paris Conservatoire, which led to their introduction into all the conservatoires of France and Belgium. It is probable that the present edition is the most complete that has been issued, for the exercises have had the experienced editing of Mr. Randegger, himself a teacher of world-wide reputation, who has added breath and accentuation marks and phrasing indications. The exercises are written in two parts with pianoforte accompaniment, and are suitable for a soprano and mezzo-soprano, or tenor and soprano, or tenor and baritone, and, of course, could be rendered with any number of voices to each part. Their use will not only conduce to enrichment of vocal tone and good style, but will also lead to firmness of attack and appreciation of rhythm, two matters in which most vocalists are inclined to be somewhat lax.

Meditation. From "The Light of Life" (Lux Christi). Composed by Edward Elgar. Arranged for pianoforte solo by the composer.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

This is one of the most beautiful and noble orchestral preludes to be found in modern oratorios, and its arrangement for the household instrument will doubtless be welcomed by many amateur pianists. For their benefit it may be stated that Mr. Elgar did not intend his piece to "represent the attitude of a person meditating, but the ideas upon which he meditates." The theme, which begins in the second bar in the bass, is that of the Levites' Psalm "Oh give thanks unto the Lord." Immediately after the first double-bar is the subject of the "Blind man's poignant prayer" ("To me the day and night are equal"), and this is continued after the second double-bar. The Allegretto begins with the theme of "Christ the Healer and Consoler," and the theme of "Light—material and spiritual" subsequently enters in 4-4 measure. It is scarcely necessary to add that the prelude calls for a pianist with a sympathetic touch and one who can make the instrument sing. Otherwise its executive demands are by no means exacting.

Fragments of an Autobiography. By Felix Moscheles.
[James Nisbet and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Felix Moscheles is well-known as the son of the great pianist, the godson of Mendelssohn, an artist of repute, and an enthusiastic advocate for peace—one, in fact, who spares no efforts to hasten on the time when "wars shall cease unto the ends of the earth." But this interesting volume, no less than his former book ("In Bohemia with Du Maurier"), gives him a distinct claim to skill in literary handicraft—an attribute often found wanting in books of the reminiscent genus. Mr. Moscheles, naturally enough, has much to say concerning his godfather, Mendelssohn. A specially interesting anecdote of the composer of "Elijah" is that which relates to the Queen. In 1847, the year of his death, Mendelssohn had been once more, as in 1842, "making music with the Queen," and had been genuinely delighted with her rendering of his songs. As he was about to leave, she said:—

"'Now, Dr. Mendelssohn, you have given me so much pleasure; is there nothing I can do to give you pleasure?' To be sure he answered that he was more than amply rewarded by Her Majesty's gracious reception, and by what would be a lasting remembrance of the interest she had shown in his music; but when she insisted, he said—

"'Well, to speak the truth, I have a wish, and one that only your Majesty can grant.'

"'It is granted,' she interposed.

"And then he told her that nothing could give him greater pleasure than to see the nurseries and all the domestic arrangements connected with the Royal children. The most consummate courtier could not have expressed a wish better calculated to please the Queen. She most cordially responded, and herself conducted him through the nurseries. Nor was the matter treated lightly; she had to show him the contents of the wardrobes and give him particulars of the service, and for the time being the two were not in the relative position of gracious sovereign and obedient servant, but rather of an experienced materfamilias and an enlightened paterfamilias, comparing notes, and giving one another points on the management of their respective children."

The chapters on Mazzini, Rossini, Claude Raoul Dupont, and the author's visit to Paris after the Commune, possess an attractiveness resulting from personal observation, vivid description, and pleasant diction. The last fifty pages of this companionable book are devoted to the author's recollections of Robert Browning. "He was the kindest and most indulgent of friends," records Mr. Moscheles, "and, as such, I remember him with gratitude and devotion; and he was the most honourable and lovable of men; and so it was natural I should honour and love him." One or two references to the great poet's love of and interest in music may be mentioned. In connection with a musical "At home" given by Mr. Moscheles in his studio, he told Sir James Ingham, at that time sitting for his portrait, of certain difficulties he had had with the various performers. Sir James thereupon wrote down the lines of Horace, beginning—

Omnibus hoc vitium
Est cantoribus.

The same day Browning came in, and seeing the lines, he took up a pen and wrote, without pausing to think:

All sorts of singers have this common vice:
To sing 'mid friends you have to ask them twice!
If you don't ask them, that's another thing:
Until the judgment-day be sure they'll sing!

Browning possessed a little dumb-keyboard of five notes, which he always kept by his side, and over which he would mechanically run his fingers. "I wondered," says Mr. Moscheles, "whether he used it to stimulate the fingers that had to keep pace with the poet's ever-flowing thoughts." A constant source of enjoyment to him at Venice and Asolo was an old spinet, marked and dated "Ferdinando Ferrari, Ravenna, 1522." "He delighted in playing upon it of an evening, simple, restful melodies that had been familiar to him for years, or quaint scraps of early German or Italian music." Enough has been said to show that these inviting pages are permeated with an interest all their own. The temptation to further quotation must be resisted. The book is one that should be read in its entirety. It will give pleasure and not a little profit. There are excellent portraits of Mrs. Charlotte Moscheles, the author's mother, Mazzini, and Robert Browning, by Mr. Moscheles.

Novello's Services, Anthems, &c. For Men's Voices. Nos. 41 and 42. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

This most useful and valuable series has hitherto consisted of reprints of widely accepted compositions, but No. 41 is a new setting of the Te Deum and Benedictus in E flat, by Mr. John E. West. This is laid out for alto, tenor, and first and second bass. The voice parts are written with manifest knowledge of what is effective in this combination, and the music, while showing perception of modern requirements, is always dignified, direct in expression, and impressive. Considerable skill is displayed in the part-writing, and the Gloria of the Benedictus is set to a briefly but vigorously developed fugue. The organ part of the Te Deum possesses considerable independence. In the Benedictus it is more simple, but in both the admirable manner in which the voices are supported by the accompaniment shows intimate acquaintance with the requirements of choral church music. No. 42, "Seek Him that maketh the seven stars," is the impressive first chorus of Mr. Edward Elgar's short oratorio "The Light of Life," originally produced at the Worcester Festival of 1896. The choral portion of this number is designed for first and second tenors and basses with a tenor solo, and although the part-writing demands careful and finished singing it does not contain any passages beyond the abilities of fairly trained singers. It is scarcely necessary to add that the excerpt would form a most expressive anthem in a church service.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 381-385.

Infinite variety continues to distinguish recent additions to this valuable series. In No. 381 the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis are arranged to Gregorian tones by Thomas Adams. For the former the first tone, fifth ending, is employed, and for the latter a Rouen melody. These are treated in a modern fashion, some of the verses being set in four-part vocal harmony, and occasional use being made of the diminished seventh and other harmonic usages of to-day. No. 382 is a setting of the Benedictus, founded on the eighth Gregorian tone, by Dr. C. Warwick Jordan, whose skill and experience in this branch of Church music it clearly shows. The music is written in four vocal parts, with occasional added notes, to enrich the organ accompaniment; but the plain-song may be sung throughout by any voice without interfering with the harmonies. Nos. 383, 384, and 385 are settings of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. The first of them, in D, is by Dr. E. J. Hopkins, and was composed for the twenty-fifth annual festival of the London Church Choir Association, at St. Paul's Cathedral, in November last. The music is distinguished by the brightness common to the compositions of this highly esteemed and experienced musician, and is an excellent example of modern Church music. It is extremely melodious, dignified, and expressive, and while easy to sing is most effectively laid out for the voices. The other two settings of the Evening Canticles (Nos. 384 and 385) are arranged to Gregorian tones by Thomas Adams. For the most part the voice parts are written in unison, but certain verses are set in harmony, and variety is secured by alternate portions being sung respectively by the sopranos, or tenors and basses.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

There has been very little music going on here lately, the close of the serial concerts bringing the season virtually to an end. Mr. J. W. Turner gave a fortnight's season of opera at the Grand Theatre, which terminated on April 22. Only familiar works were presented, and these drew fairly large audiences.

On April 25 the Handsworth Choral Society gave a performance of "St. Paul," at the Council House, with Miss Laura Taylor, Miss Madge Robottom, Mr. S. Roper, and Mr. W. Bennett as principal vocalists. Mr. Richard Richards conducted, and the accompaniments were given on the pianoforte and organ by Miss Cleobury and Mr. B. Nock.

The same evening the Moseley Choral Society gave a concert at the Moseley and Balsall Heath Institute. The programme comprised Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," some numbers from "St. Paul," and a miscellaneous selection. The South Birmingham Orchestral Union assisted and Mr. W. Henley contributed some brilliant violin solos. Mr. Berridge Hicks conducted.

The Birmingham Musical Society, now in its fifty-eighth year, gave a ladies' night at the Grand Hotel on the 2nd ult. Miss Aimée Wathen was the solo vocalist, and glees were rendered by the choir of the Society, under the direction of Mr. G. W. Halliley.

The musical matinées in connection with the Birmingham Royal Society of Artists are being held every Saturday, under the management of Mr. Oscar Pollack. A great many new performers have been introduced to the public, and the attendances have been good. The Open Air Concerts Association, which was formed last year, is preparing to resume its work, and the courts of this city will soon be jubilant with song. Music in the public parks began on the 6th ult., the Police Band opening the season in Cannon Hill Park.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL AND DISTRICT.

Downend Choral Society, of which Mr. Harold Bernard is conductor, gave its annual concert on April 24, and presented a miscellaneous programme, the principal feature in which was Stanford's "Revenge." There was a small orchestra of ladies and gentlemen, among the members being the three Misses Riseley, daughters of the well-known conductor.

St. Bartholomew's Choral Society closed its season on April 25 with a concert in the Parish Room, the soloists being Miss Marion Harris, Miss Ada Bennett, Mr. J. York, and Mr. E. G. Richards. The first part of the programme consisted of Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter" and a selection from "La Sonnambula." In the second (miscellaneous) part Miss F. M. Thomas, who also acted as accompanist, played Chopin's Nocturne in E flat. Mr. Alfred Brookes conducted.

The Society of St. Michael's Gleemen, which was started towards the close of 1898, mainly to assist in parochial gatherings, justified its existence by a highly creditable performance, at Redland Park Hall, on April 25, under the direction of Mr. Wallace J. H. Greenham, organist of St. Michael's Church. Glees and part-songs were contributed by the choir, songs by Miss Eva Hartshorne, Miss Ada Bennett, and Mr. R. Brandon (Bristol Cathedral), and instrumental productions by Miss Effie Brown (violin), Mr. Momber (violoncello), and Mr. F. Southby (pianoforte).

City Road Choral Society concerns itself principally with the study of oratorios, and on the 3rd ult., in the Lecture Hall, presented Mendelssohn's "St. Paul," Mr. C. J. Sprankling conducting. The soloists were Miss Amy Perry, Miss Rosa Mayo, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. Arthur Mass. In a small band Mr. Ernest Lane held the principal first violin, and Mr. Arthur Allis was at the organ.

The Broad Plain House Choir, connected with Highbury Chapel, gave a concert on the 4th ult., at its "House," which is situated in one of the poor districts of Bristol. A cantata, "Day and Night," by Mr. H. Ernest Nichol, formed the leading feature, the solos in the work being sung by Miss Edna Keen, Mrs. A. Tavener, Mr. W. P. Price, and Mr. E. Leonard. There was a small orchestra, Mr. A. N. Price and Mr. C. Leslie Cummins were respectively at the pianoforte and organ, and Mr. W. Vaughan Jenkins was conductor.

A striking advance has been made by the St. Mary's Church Choral Society, under the direction of Mr. F. W. Rootham, and with an increasing reputation the Society gave its concert on the 5th ult., in the large Victoria Room, Clifton. The principal features of the performance were Mendelssohn's "First Walpurgis Night" and Stanford's "Revenge." The soloists in the cantata were Miss F. M. Bush, Mr. Gwilym Evans, and Mr. W. H. Wickes. Miss Alice Boaden afforded much gratification by the effective manner in which she sang "Softly sighs," from "Der Freischütz," and Elizabeth's Prayer, from "Tannhäuser." A new part-song, words and music by Mr. R. O. Beachcroft, one of the masters of Clifton College, deserves special mention. "Old age will frown on youth and folly" is pleasant in sentiment, and the stanzas are appropriately set, so that the result was an effective little composition, which Mr. Beachcroft conducted. He must have felt pleased at the favourable verdict of the audience.

The members of the Æolian Male Choir, Bristol, on the 12th ult., abandoned their customary weekly practice of glees, and assembled at the rooms of Mr. Belsten, a committee man, and presented the secretary and treasurer, Mr. F. H. Simpson, with a finely carved oak barometer.

On the 17th and 18th ult. concerts were given at the Victoria Rooms. The vocalists were Miss Jennie Ffoulkes, who had sung before in Clifton in the Welsh Ladies' Choir, Miss Clara Butt, Mr. William Green, Mr. Kennerley Rumford, and Mr. F. Bath. The instrumentalists were Herr Georg (pianoforte), M. Johannes Wolff (violin), and Mr. Leo Stern (violoncello), with Mr. F. A. Sewell, accompanist. Though all who took part in the performances were well received, special marks of favour were bestowed upon Miss Clara Butt, who had grown up in Bristol and received the earlier portion of her musical training there.

A concert was given in the Victoria Hall, Radstock, on the 17th ult., by Miss Lily Gardner (Clifton), Miss Hetha Richards (Bath), Dr. St. John Bullen (Clifton), and Mr. Ernest Young (Clifton).

At St. James's Presbyterian Church, on the 17th ult., an organ recital was given by Mr. A. E. Hill, organist of St. John's Church, Clifton. The vocalists were Miss Tippett and Mr. F. Crombie Frost.

BATH.

On the 4th ult. the Society of Bristol Gleemen appeared at the Assembly Rooms, Bath, and gave a concert in aid of the funds of the Royal United Hospital, the choir having been invited to do so by the Rev. E. Handley, chairman of the hospital committee, who is also chairman of the Bath Orpheus Glee Society. In April, 1888, the Gleemen visited Bath for a similar object, and one result of that gathering was the suggestion made by a local newspaper that a society for the practice of unaccompanied part-singing might be established there. Hence the formation of the Bath Orpheus Choir, under the direction of Mr. H. T. Sims. The excellent manner in which the Gleemen interpret the pieces in their répertoire is widely recognised in the West of England, and at their recent concert they sang some of their more effective compositions, under the direction of Mr. W. J. Kidner.

On the 6th ult. the season of Bath Pump Room concerts was brought to a termination with two performances, and the Mayor and Corporation attended the afternoon gathering in state. Mr. R. H. Moore (chairman of the committee) stated that during the season 28,122 persons had paid for admission, but it was not the aim of the Corporation to make money. He was sure the concerts were now firmly established, and congratulated Mr. Max Heymann, the conductor, on the efficiency of the band. At the two concerts the vocalist was Miss Alice Boaden.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The month just passed has been an unusually busy one musically. The foremost event was the Feis Ceoil, a detailed account of which appears in another column. The Dublin Musical Society gave a good performance of "Elijah," on the 4th ult., with an unusually good caste of solo singers—Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Alice Lamb, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. Andrew Black.

The Orpheus Society gave an enjoyable concert on the 6th ult. The choir is an admirable one, well balanced and well trained, and should be the medium for presenting to a Dublin audience the really fine unaccompanied vocal part-music which is now never heard in our city. The conductor is such an able musician that he must surely recognise the opportunity he has of doing a really serious piece of musical work.

The Dublin Orchestral Society gave its third concert in the Theatre Royal, on April 26. The orchestra gave fine renderings of Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture and of Wagner's "Faust" Overture. Signor Esposito conducted.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

The season of the Norwich "Gate House" Choir was closed on the 5th ult., when the Society gave its fifty-sixth concert in Noverre's Room. Gade's cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter" was the chief choral feature, the solos in which were taken by Mrs. F. A. Smith, Miss J. Woodrow, and Mr. Springall. The concerted numbers were rendered with all the refinement which Mr. Kingston Rudd, the conductor, generally succeeds in getting from his forces. Violin solos were contributed by Mr. Aldo Antonietti, and that gentleman, in conjunction with Mr. Rudd, was heard with much pleasure in Beethoven's Violin and Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 32, No. 2) in C minor.

The concert given by the Norwich Cathedral choir in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 9th ult., was, as usual, well attended, for it is the only opportunity occurring during the year when citizens can hear some of our grand old madrigals and glees sung with that perfect blending of voices so eminently characteristic of the Cathedral choir. Dr. Bates conducted, and in Purcell's "In these delightful pleasant groves," Weelkes's "As Vesta was," and Morley's "Shoot, false love," the most delicate gradations of tone were obtained, while more modern compositions of a similar nature received equally fine rendering. Solos were sung by Master W. A. Smith, one of the choristers, and the Precentor, Rev. T. I. Thomas. Several violin solos, cleverly played by Mr. A. Coote-Sugget, made an agreeable variety in the programme.

Under the fostering care of the Rev. H. C. Rogers, the vicar of the parish, a Musical Society has lately been formed at Narborough, a village in the Lynn district. On the 17th ult. this body gave a concert in the Assembly Room, Swaffham, when Darnton's pastoral cantata "Village life" was most creditably given, as were several part-songs. The soloists comprised Miss Mabel Hayward, Miss A. Hatch, Mr. H. J. Luckett, and Rev. E. J. Alvis. Miss Smith, of Swaffham, accompanied.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

"Elijah" was given at St. Mary's Cathedral, on the 12th ult. (Ascension Day), under Mr. T. H. Collinson's careful direction—the first occasion, it is believed, on which the oratorio has been undertaken by an unassisted Cathedral choir. The building was filled to overflowing with an interested and most appreciative congregation, and the excellent choir added one more laurel to its wreath. The accompaniments were well played by an orchestra of local players.

The Kosman Quartet made its first appearance in Edinburgh, on the 5th ult., and in quartets by Mozart and Schumann it at once established a claim to a respectful hearing. Artistic perception, capable execution, and careful rehearsal combined to secure a well-deserved success. Mr. Kosman was warmly received for his playing of solos by Goltermann and Ries, and Miss Jenny McTaggart made an excellent impression by her singing of "I attempt from love's sickness to fly" (Purcell) and songs by Schumann, Brahms, and others.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The season was prolonged this year, not as usual by a series of pianoforte recitals, but by a succession of chamber concerts. Chamber music has never flourished in the West of Scotland; every attempt that has been made hitherto to foster it locally has failed, and our experience of visiting quartet parties is that they have not been particularly eager to follow up their débuts. The end of the present season has seen a first visit of one of the most famous of Continental quartet combinations, a second visit of Dr. Joachim's party, and the start—an unusually promising one—of another effort to establish, on something like an assured footing, a local organisation for the production of chamber music. Mr. Kosman, formerly leader of Mr. Manns's Glasgow orchestra, is at the head of the new Glasgow Quartet, and gives it his name. With him are Mr. Richard Daeblitz, leader of the second violins in the Scottish Orchestra, and two sound local professionals, Mr. John Daly and Mr. Willy Benda, viola and violoncello respectively. The party have given two concerts, and have on each occasion gathered round them enthusiastic audiences as large as the hall in which they appeared would hold. Their programmes have embraced Schumann's F major Quartet, Beethoven's No. 6 of Op. 18, and, by way of novelty, Christian Sinding's interesting and forceful Pianoforte Quintet, in which they were associated with Mr. Philip Halstead. They have exhibited quite remarkable finish and sympathy. At these concerts two promising young singers were introduced—Miss Annie Tweedie and Miss Gordon Pillans. Mr. Willy Benda gave a concert last month at Greenock with a local orchestra, to which he has communicated a degree of spiritedness rare in Scottish amateur combinations.

The accounts of the last season of the Choral and Orchestral Union have now been made up, and it appears that there is a small balance on the right side. The figures are of interest as showing how an orchestra is financed. They are — income, £8,495 2s. 6d.; expenditure, £8,302 10s. 1d.—surplus, £195 12s. 5d. The Scottish Orchestra of eighty players was in being about two months and a half, and gave twenty-seven concerts in Glasgow, besides playing in several other towns in Scotland. Already a guarantee fund of between £3,000 and £4,000 has been raised for next season.

On the evening of April 27 the members of the music classes connected with the Glasgow United Young Men's Christian Association gave their closing concert for the season, when a large audience again testified to the abiding popularity of Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The performance was in most respects worthy of the choir—numbering about 400 voices. Madame Shepherd, Miss H. G. Mainds, Messrs. Stuart Moncur and Atherton Smith had charge of the solos, Mr. W. H. Cole led the orchestra, Mr. Clapperton was organist, and Mr. R. L. Reid conducted.

The Robert Cunningham Opera Company was at the Theatre Royal for a fortnight, and produced, besides some of the more hackneyed operas, Somervell's operatic drama "The Three Musketeers."

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(From our own Correspondent.)

From month to month a regular report has been given of the more important undertakings during the past season; but the limits of our space forbade the record being so extended as to include many events which, although less prominent and imposing, must necessarily be taken into account if a fair estimate of the musical position of this not unimportant centre of activity would be obtained. Probably around no city are there so many busy suburban societies quietly and steadily spreading a taste for music of the highest class, and enlarging the area from which supporters of the more ambitious and costly undertakings are drawn. Their unostentatious labour may not be lightly regarded, whether their work is entirely choral, or they attempt the more difficult task of bringing forward local instrumental talent, and thereby facilitating the presentation of large works with adequate accompaniment without that ruinous expense which has hitherto thwarted so many enthusiastic efforts. To attract an audience to listen to some well-known artist is easy; but to cultivate the local resources of each little district is a far more important matter and an infinitely more patriotic effort.

ORGAN RECITALS.

And, speaking of serious music, perhaps nowhere more encouragingly than in and about Manchester are the lovers of the organ so numerous, or could they be more regularly drawn together than they are to the weekly recitals of our able city organist, Mr. Kendrick Pyne, and to the occasional performances given at the Salford Corporation Hall by local players of ability. From time to time we have been able to glance at Mr. Pyne's programmes and to congratulate him upon his ability and success. Looking through the work of the winter session, we find abundant evidence of the variety, if not of the catholicity of Mr. Pyne's reading. His easy mastery of the intricacies of the works of Bach and of Mendelssohn is well known and highly appreciated. The fugues and sonatas form the backbone of the Saturday evening recitals; while effusions of the French school, from Guilmant downward, have been sprinkled in plentifully. Naturally from Dr. Wesley's portfolio liberal excerpts have been made; but perhaps larger selections might have been chosen from among the many fresh and melodious compositions of H. Smart and other worthies; and there are many erudite fugues by Ouseley which are not merely scholastic and should not be entirely overlooked.

ROUND ABOUT MANCHESTER.

The evidences of Dr. Henry Watson's love of vocal part-music are not confined to the work of the Vocal Society and of the Glee Club; but are corroborated at Stretford by the efforts of the Choral Society; at Stockport by the Vocal Union, which calls for the assistance of distinguished soloists; and at Accrington, where Dr. Watson has an orchestra as well as a large choir. As a lecturer, also, upon many interesting topics he is thoroughly equipped, being able to extract from his costly library of old works and his large collection of ancient instruments much information respecting the music of past days.

Among the neighbouring towns which are, practically, suburbs of Manchester, Oldham has ever ranked well musically. During the past winter the Werneth Vocal Society, under Mr. Robert Jackson, of St. Peter's Church, gave "St. Paul" and other works, with fair-sized choir and band. The Orchestral Society, under Mr. Lawton, was as active as usual; and the St. Cecilia Society, under Mr. James F. Slater, was busy with English opera. Excellent performances were given occasionally by the Leeds organist, Mr. Fricker; and, more regularly, by Mr. J. Clafton, of St. James's Church, and by Mr. Ingham, at St. Thomas's.

At Ashton-under-Lyne and elsewhere, Mr. T. Keighley has been very active and specially prominent as an organist of great ability, not afraid to grapple with the most difficult works; and the Philharmonic Society has been engaged in performing oratorio and opera under the able guidance of Mr. G. T. Wrigley, who also, at his annual concert, generally manages to introduce some striking novelties in chamber music. At Wigan, performances of the "Elijah," "Messiah," and "Creation" were essayed creditably during the dark months; and at Pendleton, Mr. F. Blacow gave, at the close of the twenty-eighth season of his Choral Union, a centenary performance of the "Creation," with a choir of 120 and a small amateur orchestra.

The record is distinctly encouraging, and now the whole district settles down to the quiet maturing of plans to be actively pursued when the song of the woods is again hushed and music once more pushed indoors.

But not to be included among our regular enjoyments was the competitive gathering, on the 13th ult., of the singing classes from Northern Lancashire and Southern Yorkshire, fostered by the Clarion Vocal Union. The combined singing of the associated classes was good, although often not showing a very deep insight into the composer's meaning; but many of the singers were too young to allow of the separate choirs appearing to advantage. Mr. G. W. Lane adjudicated and awarded the prize to a Manchester class of about fifty voices.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM AND DISTRICT.

Music in Nottingham is practically stagnant for the summer months, save in the case of the local contingent for the Lincoln Festival, which meets under Mr. F. Marshall Ward, and is doing excellent work under his careful tuition.

In Derby, Mr. Harold Henry's Orchestral Society brought its season to a conclusion on April 26, when a full audience and a good performance of an interesting programme rewarded the zeal of the members. The soloists were Madame Clara Gardiner (vocal), Mr. Sydney Sadler (pianoforte), and Mr. Harold Henry (violin), all of whom met with a hearty reception.

The orchestra played works by Beethoven, Haydn, and Wagner; but special mention should be made of their performance of Mackenzie's music to "The Little Minister" and Mr. Henry's "Romance" (repeated by request). Mr. Sadler undertook the pianoforte accompaniments, and Mr. E. M. Barker conducted, save in the "Romance," which was directed by the composer.

A good performance of Schubert's "Song of Miriam" was given on Sunday, the 14th ult., by the choir of St. Chad's, Derby, under the direction of Mr. T. H. Bennett, the organist and choirmaster of the church.

The Ashburn Orchestral Society terminated its season on the 4th ult., when a fine programme was given, which included Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques," and a "Tannhäuser" selection. Miss Olive Harcourt was heard to advantage in Gounod's "O Divine Redeemer" and in the recitative and aria "Deh! vieni," from Mozart's "Figaro." Mr. J. R. Booth was the solo violinist and gave a fine performance of Vieuxtemps's "Polonaise." An interesting novelty was the trombone solo played by Mr. Banyard. The orchestral pieces reflected the utmost credit on the conductor, Mr. W. H. Tutt, who is to be congratulated upon the termination of the Society's thirteenth season.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

The Amateur Musical Society gave its May concert in the Albert Hall on the 2nd ult., when considerable interest was centred in the performance of Cowen's "Ode to the Passions." A small string orchestra, supplemented by a pianoforte, played the accompaniments in an exemplary manner, though much of the tone colouring of the effective instrumentation was necessarily lost. The choruses were sung with admirable tone and expression, especially the stirring final chorus, and Mr. Schollhammer, who conducted, had to repeatedly acknowledge the applause at the close. After a short miscellaneous selection, to which Mr. J. W. Phillips (organ solos), Mr. J. Lycett, Miss Whitehead, and others contributed with marked success, Bennett's "May Queen" was performed. A capable quartet of soloists, a chorus familiar with their work and singing the strains of their townsman con amore, and a faultlessly played instrumental background, all contributed towards a thoroughly enjoyable rendering of the cantata. The services of Mr. Schollhammer, conductor, Mr. Phillips, pianist, and Mr. J. Peck, leader, call for something more than complimentary reference.

On the 9th ult. the Male Glee and Madrigal Society gave its spring concert in the Music Hall. The principal feature of the programme was Saint-Saëns's double chorus "The Soldiers of Gideon," performed for the first time in Sheffield. The choristers distinguished themselves in attack, tone, and phrasing, winning high praise, and the pitch being maintained for twelve minutes. One of the successes of the concert was Mr. John E. West's dainty part-song "Beware," which had to be repeated in response to loud applause. Madame Goodall and Mr. J. Pearson were the soloists, and Mr. J. A. Rodgers conducted and played three pianoforte solos.

The University College Musical Society performed Bennett's "May Queen" on the 12th ult., under Dr. Coward. The choristers, mainly students at the College, sang with precision and expression, and an excellent band, led by Mr. J. T. Hill, contributed to the success of the performance. Gade's Trio (Op. 42) was delightfully played by Mrs. T. P. Lockwood, Mr. Schollhammer, and Dr. Arthur Hall.

The St. John's (Abbeydale) Choral Society gave a successful performance of Cowen's "Rose Maiden" on the 17th ult. A small but excellently trained chorus sang with accuracy and expression the melodious choral numbers, and Mr. G. A. Seed, the conductor, is to be complimented on the success of the concert. Miss E. Davies, Miss A. Freeman, Mr. W. H. Burrows, and Mr. H. Reynolds were the soloists.

The Eyam Choral Society performed Bennett's "The May Queen," on the 23rd ult., under the direction of Mr. J. W. Froggatt. Miss L. Mellor led the band and Mr. Ireland was accompanist.

MUSIC IN WALES.

The Vale of Conway Church Choral Association, numbering about 300 voices, drawn from Blaenau Festiniog and the Vale of Conway, down to Llandudno, held its annual Festival at Trinity Church, Llandudno, on the 8th ult., Mr. John Williams, Carnarvon, acting as conductor, and Mr. R. W. Davies, Festiniog, as organist. The Festival was a great success, the quality and balance of voices being good and the intelligent manner in which the Psalms were chanted deserving especial commendation.

A number of singing festivals have also been recently held amongst the various Nonconformist bodies. Their programmes are very much alike in that they consist of a number of hymn-tunes, one or two anthems or choruses, and a few chants, differing in these latter from the Church festivals, where greater prominence is given to chanting—a comparatively recent innovation in Welsh Nonconformist worship. Whether chanting will ever become popular amongst Welsh Nonconformists or not, may be a debatable point; but the efforts made in connection with these festivals, and the excellent collection of hymn-tunes, &c., now possessed by the Church and the leading Nonconformist bodies, ought to make for marked improvement in sacred music throughout the Principality.

In connection with later collections for the use of the Welsh Church, the Cathedral Prayer Book and Psalter recently issued (in Welsh) by Messrs. Novello and Co. occupies a very marked position. Undoubtedly this important publication will have far-reaching influence on the music of the Church in Wales, and more or less indirectly on the music of the Sanctuary throughout the country generally.

At a recent Eisteddfod held in the county town of Carmarthen, Dr. Roland Rogers, of Bangor, one of the musical adjudicators, strongly animadverted on the exaggerated and theatrical displays made by some of the conductors. "Why on earth," he asked, "do not conductors learn how to conduct properly?" A query which has been repeatedly put for years past by other Eisteddfodic judges, Welsh and English, and apparently to but little purpose.

The programme of the next Meirion Eisteddfod, held annually at Dolgelly, has been issued, and the selection of Gounod's "Gallia" as the chief choral subject, taken in conjunction with that of Sir Hubert Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens" at the Cardiff National meetings, is encouraging, in that it shows that all Eisteddfodic committees are not disposed to remain satisfied with the constant reiteration of the same well-threshed pieces.

Dr. Joseph Parry, musical lecturer at the University College, Cardiff, in a recent lecture delivered by him, regretted the absence of proper facilities for acquiring musical education in Wales, and urged the necessity for a Welsh college of music. Apart from the question of ways and means, one of the difficulties in connection with such a college would be the matter of location. Wales has no metropolis, nor any chief central town, and the two main divisions of the Principality are farther from one another than from London.

MUSIC IN STAFFORDSHIRE.

After some years of slumber the cause of choral music has been again revived in Stafford by the formation of a choral union, the members of which made their début on April 25, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Drury, of Uttoxeter. The work chosen for the first part of the programme was Gaul's "Holy City," and the second part was devoted to a miscellaneous selection. It is gratifying to say the concert was a success from a musical and financial point of view. The band and chorus numbered 140 performers. The soloists were Miss Alice Porter, Miss Hackett, Mr. Samuel Masters, and Mr. Harry J. England, all of whom sang with much acceptance. The rendering of the choral parts of the work reflected great credit upon the members of the Society, and Mr. Drury is to be congratulated upon the results of his first efforts in the cause of choral music in the County town of Staffordshire.

The annual singing competition of the Federation of London Girls' Clubs was held on the 6th ult., in St. Andrew's Hall, Newman Street. Dr. McNaught was the adjudicator, the number of choirs competing being eleven, divided into two classes. The test piece in Class I. was "Winds are blowing" (Battison Haynes), and in Class II. "Come o'er the woodland" (A. Ketèlbey). The united choirs sang "A Bird Song" (Rogers), "Welcome thou" (Handel), and "Bell March" (Brabham), under the conductorship of the Rev. Lewis Hunt. After a spirited contest Dr. McNaught awarded the challenge trophy to the St. Mary of Eton Girls' Club choir (trained by Mr. D. A. Fox), which gained the full number of marks allowed for their performance of the test piece, and twenty-nine out of a possible thirty for the sight reading test. The following choirs competed: St. Mary of Eton Girls' Club; Soho; All Hallows, Southwark; Marylebone; Clerkenwell; St. Edward's; St. Catharine's; St. John's, Westminster; St. Margaret's, Westminster; St. Pancras, Roehampton. H.R.H. the Duchess of York was present during a portion of the proceedings.

The performance of Mackenzie's oratorio "The Rose of Sharon," by the West Hampstead Choral and Orchestral Society, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 18th ult., was an ambitious attempt for a suburban society, and the result was, on the whole, creditable, especially in regard to the choral portions. As is not unusual on these (and other) occasions, the ladies were distinctly the "better half" of the choir, and sang with much spirit the difficult music, notably in the fine chain of choruses beginning "Make a joyful noise." The orchestra can hardly be said to have been completely successful in grappling with the intricate instrumentation. The solos were in the experienced hands of Madame Clara Samuell, Madame Lena Law, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Montague Borwell, all of whom rendered justice to their respective music. Mr. W. N. Barron presided ably at the organ, and Mr. E. G. Croager, who was, during the interval, the recipient of a gratifying testimonial in the shape of a silver salver, and also deserves much praise for his care in training both choir and orchestra, conducted with conspicuous watchfulness.

The South London Choral Association gave an interesting concert at the Institute of Music, in the Camberwell New Road, on the 1st ult., when three of the most successful choral compositions produced of late years were performed in association with Mr. F. H. Cowen's "Four English Dances in the Olden Style." Sir F. Bridge's vigorous setting of Mr. Rudyard Kipling's "The Flag of England" again won hearty appreciation, and further proof was afforded of the effectiveness of Mr. A. Davidson Arnott's "The Ballad of Carmilhan." In these works, as also in Professor Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore," the choralists conducted by Mr. L. C. Venables sang with commendable steadiness and spirit. The solo numbers were allotted to Miss Emily Davies and Mr. Arthur Walenn, and Mr. Cowen's elegant Dances were brightly rendered by the band.

Messrs. Norman Bath and F. Lewis Thomas gave the last concert of the present season of the Bromley (Kent) chamber concerts, at the Co-operative Hall, on the 4th ult., when a large and appreciative audience assembled. The concert-givers were assisted by Mr. Denan Bath (violin), Mr. Vernon Addison (viola), Mr. Tennyson Werge (violoncello), and Miss Maude Clough (vocalist). Rheinberger's Pianoforte Quartet in E flat and Mozart's String Quartet in G major (Op. 12) each received a rendering particularly marked by genuine ensemble playing. The Terzetto in A (Op. 74), by Dvorák, for two violins and viola, although almost a novelty, was at once received with pleasure. Messrs. Tennyson Werge and F. Lewis Thomas received a very hearty recall after their performance of Chopin's Introduction and Polonaise in C.

Miss Minnie Crouch gave a pianoforte recital at St. James's Schools, Muswell Hill, on April 28, with exceptional success. Her programme included Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue (Op. 35, No. 2), Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 2), one of Liszt's Rhapsodies, Schumann's Andante and Variations for two pianofortes (with her master, Mr. Willem Coenen), and various other pieces, including Coenen's Nocturne "Twilight." The young pianist displayed remarkable versatility, combining both delicacy and power, and she reflects very great credit on Mr. Coenen's ability as a teacher, adding another to the list of his successes at the Guildhall School of music. Songs were contributed by Mrs. Clayton and Mr. Charles Crouch, the latter giving a clever song, "The childlike heart," by Mr. Coenen, with much success.

A very enjoyable "At home" was given, on the 11th ult., at the Kensington Town Hall, by Miss Frederika Taylor and Miss Helen Hulme, who have made a specialty of duet singing. Their sympathetic voices admirably blended together in duets by Handel, Rubinstein, &c.; but perhaps the success of the afternoon was their rendering of Mrs. Needham's "Irish Lullaby." Songs were sung by Mr. Walter Ford and Mr. Gabriel Thorp, while the instrumentalists included Miss Edith Drake, Madame Anna Lang, and Miss Gwendolyn Toms, and Miss Sharp contributed some excellent recitations.

The ninth annual choir festival of the Choir Guild of the Diocese of Long Island was held at Grace Church, Brooklyn, on April 27. Mr. Frank Wright was the Precentor and conducted the service. The programme included Gadsby's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C; Steane's unaccompanied anthem, "My soul truly waiteth"; Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father"; Haydn's "The Heavens are telling"; and Martin's Te Deum in C. A very efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. Wright, played the accompaniments, and Mr. C. F. Mason and Mr. T. Allen Cleaver presided at the organ. The chorus, consisting of thirteen choirs of the diocese, gave evidence of careful training on the part of the Precentor.

The students of the Metropolitan training colleges for school masters and mistresses, established in connection with the Church of England, combined to hold a special service in St. Paul's Cathedral on the evening of Ascension Day, the 11th ult. As all training college students are thoroughly and systematically taught to sing, they formed, on this occasion, a fine choir of about 800 voices. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis from Stainer's Service in B flat; the chorus, "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," from Gounod's "Redemption," and four hymn-tunes were sung. Sir John Stainer and Dr. McNaught conducted, and Mr. Charles Macpherson was at the organ. The sermon was preached by the Bishop of Rochester.

The annual Festival of the Sons of the Clergy (the 245th) was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, on April 26, in the customary manner. A full orchestra and an augmented choir of about 200 voices were conducted by Sir George Martin. The musical features included Sir Arthur Sullivan's "In Memoriam" Overture, a selection from "The Prodigal Son," and the "Hallelujah" Chorus. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in G, specially set for the occasion by Mr. Battison Haynes, proved happy examples of effectiveness produced by simple means. Dignity and devotional feeling are preserved, whilst the breadth and freshness of spirit instinct throughout cannot fail to gain appreciative recognition.

The Marlborough Place Amateur Orchestral Society, St. John's Wood, gave its fifth annual concert in the Lecture Hall, Marlborough Place, on the 2nd ult., with gratifying success. In two movements from Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, two of Cowen's "Four English Dances," in addition to other selections, the members of the orchestra showed an earnestness of purpose and acquitted themselves with credit to their able conductor, Mr. Paul Oppenheimer. Variety was imported into the programme by songs contributed by Miss Stanley Lucas, Miss Florence Croft, and Mr. D'Arcy Clayton; while Mr. J. T. Bailey played a bassoon solo, "Lucy Long," with humorous acceptance and prolonged applause.

The Ealing Philharmonic Society gave a concert at the Victoria Hall on April 26, when one of the chief features of the programme was Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night," of which an excellent performance was given by the choir and orchestra. The latter also played an "Italian" Suite by Zenoni, Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Mendelssohn's "Cornelius" March and the Finale to the "Scotch" Symphony, and Beethoven's Turkish March from the "Ruins of Athens." Songs were contributed by Messrs. John Johnson and Marshall Lewis, and violin solos by Mr. Ernest Hopkinson, who led the orchestra. The performance was conducted with ability by Mr. E. Victor Williams.

Admirable performances of Professor Stanford's choral ballad "The Revenge" and Requiem were given on April 27, in the Great Hall of the Northern Polytechnic Institute, by the Finsbury Choral Association, under the direction of the composer. There was a numerous audience, who listened to these characteristic and highly impressive works with marked interest and frequent manifestations of their appreciation. Miss Ethel Wood, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Thomas Thomas, and Mr. Kennerley Rumford were the able interpreters of the solo parts in the Requiem.

THE Bishopsgate Institute Choral and Orchestral Society gave its last concert of the season, on the 4th ult., when Dr. Harford Lloyd's "Hero and Leander," the chief feature in the programme, received an excellent rendering. The performances of the "Spinning Chorus" from Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and the Polonaise with Chorus from Glinka's "Life for the Czar," reflected great credit upon the Society and its conductor. The soloists, Miss Florence Matthews, Miss Tatchell, and Mr. Harry Dearth, gave every satisfaction. The Rev. J. M. Gaben led the orchestra, Mr. J. R. Griffiths presided at the pianoforte, and Mr. W. A. B. Russell conducted.

THE Euston Glee Union, an effective combination of male-voice singers (members of the London and North-Western Railway staff at Euston Station), gave a most successful concert, at the Court House, Harlesden, on the 2nd ult., under the able baton of Mr. Miles Wybourn, when they fully sustained their excellent reputation for the admirable rendering of glees and part-songs. The efficient soloists were Mr. Ivor Foster and Mr. Gilbert Denis. Violoncello solos were contributed by Mr. C. F. Malcolm, and Mr. E. Bristol rendered the accompaniments in good taste.

A VERY successful concert was given on the 8th ult., by the All Saints' Choral Society, Battersea Park, when Sterndale Bennett's cantata "May Queen" was very creditably performed. The soloists were Miss Margaret Nutter, Miss Kate Luke, Mr. Ernest Harris, and Mr. Robert Greir. The string orchestra was led by Mr. F. H. Beale, and Messrs. W. J. Wiltshire and C. J. Capponi presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively. The performance was ably conducted by Mr. Alex. Wilson, who founded this flourishing Society a year ago.

THE fourth concert of the nineteenth season of the Bromley (Kent) Musical Society took place at the Drill Hall, on April 25, when Mendelssohn's "Walpurgis Night" was given. The solos were interpreted by Miss F. Gallis, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Bertram H. Latter. The performance throughout was marked with an intelligent appreciation of the highly dramatic character of the music. The band and chorus of 150 performers discharged their duties in excellent style. Mr. F. Lewis Thomas, as usual, conducted.

AN admirable performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was given by the Streatham Choral Society, on the 1st ult., at the Streatham Hall. The solo vocalists were Madame Ruth Lamb, Miss Ida Mann, Miss Lilian Hovey, Messrs. Braxton Smith, Arthur Barlow, and F. B. Ranalow. There was a complete professional orchestra, and the choir of the Society greatly distinguished themselves by their refined and expressive singing. Mr. Stewart Macpherson, who has recovered from his recent indisposition, conducted.

AT the annual prize distribution to the pupils of the London Society for Teaching the Blind, which took place on the 6th ult., in the Concert Hall of the Institution, Eton Avenue, an excellent programme was rendered by the musical students, under the able direction of Mr. Edwin Barnes. Besides organ and pianoforte solos, it included Mendelssohn's two part-songs, "Harvest Field" and "Autumn Song," "In going to my lonely bed" (Edwardes), and "Lady, see on every side" (Marenzio).

STAINER'S "Daughter of Jairus" and a miscellaneous selection of sacred music were given in Devonshire Square Baptist Church on the 11th ult. The solos were admirably rendered by Miss Kate Cherry, Mr. Miles Mole, and Mr. George Uttley. The choir, of about fifty voices, sang the choruses with great spirit and in excellent time and tune. Mr. Charles E. Smith presided at the organ, and Mr. G. Ernest Arundel, the honorary organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

MR. EDGAR F. JACQUES delivered the first of his three lectures "On the music of India and the East, and its influence on the music of Europe," at the Royal Institution, on the 20th ult. We hope to give a report of the series in our next issue.

A LARGE number of exhibitions and scholarships will be awarded at the Guildhall School of Music in the month of July, the most valuable being the Knoop, of the value of £75 per annum, for a violoncello student, and the Erard, £40 19s. per annum, for a pianoforte student. Other exhibitions vary from £30 to £5 per annum. Many of these are for competition by students already in the school; four of £20 each are, however, available for outside candidates.

A FIRM of organ builders at Meissen has lately introduced pipes made of porcelain in some of their instruments, with, it is said, excellent results. The new invention has been tested by experts, who were struck with the beauty, sonority, and mellowness of tone possessed by these instruments. As a further advantage it is pointed out that the pipes consisting of the material in question are not affected by any change in the temperature.

GOUNOD'S "The Redemption" (Parts I. and II.) was given at St. Luke's Church, Hackney, on the 3rd ult., with the accompaniment of organ, harps, trumpets, and drums. Additional trumpets, stationed at the extreme sides of the church, gave impressive effect to the second part. Mr. Frederick S. Marsh, organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted, and Mr. George T. Pinches presided at the organ.

MISS MARJORIE RICHARDSON, an ex-student of the Royal College of Music, gave a successful concert at Steinert Hall, Boston, U.S.A., on April 21, with gratifying success, when she played pianoforte solos by Arensky, Nicodé, Dvorák, and Sgambati, and, with the Kneisel Quartet, introduced to a Boston audience Professor Stanford's Pianoforte Quintet in D minor (Op. 25).

MR. ALBERT FRANSELLA proposes to establish a Society for the cultivation of wind instrument music. Those who are interested in the welfare of this important branch of instrumental music are invited to communicate with Colonel R. R. E. Drake-Brockman, R.E., 27, Linden Gardens, Chiswick, the honorary secretary pro tem.

THE competition for the Agnes Zimmermann Prize at the Royal Academy of Music took place on the 15th ult., when the prize was awarded to Ethel V. Cave (a native of Bristol) and Elsie E. Horne (of London), equally. The examiners were Mrs. Emily Liddell, Miss Agnes Zimmermann, and Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland.

M. JACOBI'S popular operetta "Cinderella" was performed at Derby, Conn., on April 28., under the direction of Mr. W. Lackey and Mr. C. Ives Freeman. The work achieved a great success and promises to become very popular in America.

MR. ALFRED RHODES, author of "Curiosities of the Keyboard and the Staff," gave a demonstration lecture at the London School Board offices, Victoria Embankment, on the 8th ult., entitled "How to simplify the staff notation."

THE memorial portrait of the late Mr. Bradbury Turner, painted by Mr. Cyrus Johnson, is now being exhibited on the walls of the Royal Academy. Its ultimate destination will be the walls of Trinity College, London.

MR. GEORGE LANGLEY delivered an interesting lecture at Trinity College (London), on the 3rd ult., entitled "Music as a means of expression." Musical illustrations were contributed by Miss Agnes Winter.

MR. E. SILAS gave an interesting concert at the Guildhall School of Music, on the 18th ult., when the programme was entirely selected from his own compositions.

Erratum.—In the account of the concert given by the Woodstock Choral Society (p. 341 of our last issue), we regret that the name of Dr. Elsmore was inadvertently given as the conductor of the concert, instead of as the leader of the orchestra. The concert was ably conducted by Mr. Eugene Bayliss.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Bayreuth.—Siegfried Wagner, whose comic opera "Der Bärenhäuter" has been accepted for performance at the Royal Opera, Berlin, is already engaged upon a new work, entitled "Die Richterin," the subject being taken from one of C. F. Mayer's novels.

Berlin.—A new grand opera in four acts, by the French composer Fernand Le Borne, entitled "Mudarra," was brought out at the Royal Opera, on April 28, under the direction of Herr Richard Strauss, and well received, the composer, who was present, being several times recalled. The work had been sumptuously mounted, and a number of foreign critics had come specially to Berlin to assist at its performance. M. Le Borne, a pupil of Massenet and César Franck, is much esteemed in his native France as a composer of symphonic works.——The well known Kotzolt'sche Gesangverein celebrated, on April 30, the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation, with a special concert, consisting chiefly of a capella compositions, under the direction of Herr Leo Zeller.

Bonn.—The Chamber Music Festival, held at the Beethoven Haus, in the second week of last month, was attended by a very numerous and enthusiastic audience. The principal executants were the Joachim and Rosé (Viennese) Quartet parties, the Viennese flautist Herr Kukula, and the Berlin clarinettist, Herr Schubert; Miss Adrienne Osborne and Herr Felix Krauss being the vocalists. In addition to a number of works by Bach, Beethoven, Mozart, Haydn, Dittersdorf, Schubert, and Brahms, the programme also included the performance of the two compositions which recently obtained the Beethoven Haus prize—viz., a string quintet by W. Berger, of Berlin, and a pianoforte quartet by B. Scholz, of Frankfort, both of which elicited much interest and applause.

Brussels.—The last of the Concerts Populaires of the season, on the 7th ult., was conducted by Dr. Hans Richter, who met with a most enthusiastic reception, the principal numbers in the programme being Brahms's C minor Symphony, Bach's Suite in D, and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony.

Carlsruhe.—A new opera, "Morgiane," with a poetic and effective libretto by Herr Lamay, the music by Herr Max Brauer, director of the music at the Hofkirche, was brought out last month, at the Court Theatre, under Herr Mottl's direction, and received with high favour.

Cassel.—Spohr's recently resuscitated opera "Die Kreuzfahrer" (produced in 1845, both in Cassel and Berlin, since when it has, however, been consigned to oblivion) was performed with great success on the 7th ult., at the Royal Theatre, under Herr Beier's direction, and with Mesdames Joachim and Junek, Herren Döring, Weltinger, and Bartram in the principal parts. The work had been adapted for the modern stage by Capellmeister Beier, and will, in its present form, doubtless make its way to other German lyrical establishments.——A grand competition of male choirs, under the special patronage of the Emperor, who has instituted a very valuable and artistically designed prize for the occasion, was announced to be held on the 26th and 27th ult., the number of singers taking part being about 3,000, and a "Festhalle," seating some 6,000 persons, having been erected for the purpose. Professor Reinhold Becker, of Dresden, has written the principal prize chorus to be performed by the competing choirs.

Cologne.—Schubert's opera "Genoveva" was revived on April 23, at the Stadt-Theater, with considerable success.——At the last Gürzenich concert of the season, on April 25, the first performance took place of Richard Strauss's symphonic poem "Heldenleben." The new work, under the able conductorship of Dr. Wüllner, met with an enthusiastic reception. Perosi's "The Resurrection of Lazarus" was produced last month, also under Dr. Wüllner's direction, but failed to attract much attention.

Dessau.—The twelfth annual Musical Festival of the Principality of Anhalt, held on the 6th and 7th ult., included, on the first day, the performance of an important new oratorio, "Die Zerstörung von Jerusalem," by August Klughardt, the libretto (the leading features of which have been suggested by Kaulbach's famous painting) from the pen of Herr L. Gerlach. The performance, under the composer's direction, was an excellent one and produced a most marked impression.

Geneva.—A central association of Swiss composers and music publishers has just been formed. Amongst other objects in view the new association proposes the establishment of annual musical festivals, to be held alternately in the leading Swiss towns.

Leipzig.—The Academical Choral Society "Arion" celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation, last month, by a series of concerts of both sacred and secular music. The present conductor of this excellent Society is Herr Alfred Richter, the well known musical author and professor at the Conservatorium.——Herr Heinrich Zöllner, musical director of the University, has just completed the score of a new music-drama in five acts, entitled "Die versunkene Glocke" (after Gerhart Hauptmann's poem), which will probably be first brought out at the Dresden Opera.

Milwaukee (U.S.).—Edgar Tinel's new sacred work, "Godoleva," was received with most marked enthusiasm on its first performance, on April 18, by the Musical Society, under the direction of Herr Lüning. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies sang the principal baritone part.

Munich.—An interesting event at the Royal Opera was the first performance, on the 7th ult., of the three-act opera "Der Fremdling" by the veteran Wagner tenor, Heinrich Vogl, already favourably known as a composer by a number of songs. The libretto of the new work, dealing with a subject from Teutonic mythology, is from the pen of the well-known German author, Felix Dahn, while the music, modelled to some extent upon the earlier style of Wagner, is not without originality and some effective orchestral and choral writing. The composer himself interpreted the principal tenor part, and Frl. Ternina that of the heroine, a perfect ovation being accorded to the former at the conclusion of the performance.——At a concert given by the Choral Society, under the direction of Herr Porges, last month, the programme included Liszt's seldom heard "Beethoven Cantata" (composed for the birth-centenary of the master) as well as the same composer's symphonic poem "Prometheus," the orchestra being that of the Royal Theatre.

Paris.—The late Emmanuel Chabrier's posthumous opera-fragment "Briseïs," consisting of the first act only, was produced at the Opéra on the 8th ult., under M. Taffanel's direction, and with Mesdames Berthet and Chrétien-Vaguet, MM. Bartet, Tournets, and Vaguet in the principal parts. The libretto, which is in three acts, is founded upon Goethe's well-known ballad "Die Braut von Corinth," by Ephraim Mikhael and Catulle Mendès. The work was received with much favour by the great majority of musicians present.——At the Opéra Comique a new ballet, "Le Cygne," the music by Charles Lecocq, was brought out last month with much success.——The programme of the last Châtelet concert, under M. Colonne's direction, was of an international character, and included orchestral works by Schumann, Sgambati, Mancinelli, Smetana, and Weber; M. Raoul Pugno being much applauded in Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto and Miss Leonora Jackson arousing the enthusiasm of her audience in Brahms's Violin Concerto in D major. Mesdames Vera Eigena and Ida Ekmann contributed Russian and Scandinavian songs respectively.——M. Camille Saint-Saëns has gone to Rio de Janeiro, where he has accepted an engagement to conduct a series of concerts, under very remunerative conditions.——The birth-centenary of Halévy, the composer of "La Juive," which occurred on the 27th ult., was to be celebrated by special performances, both at the Grand Opéra and at the Académie des Beaux Arts.

Pesaro.—The Liceo Rossini has just been presented with a unique collection of portraits of the composer of "Guillaume Tell" and of the leading interpreters of his operas, the donor being a wealthy amateur, Signor Alfonso Martel.——Mascagni has been engaged to give a series of concerts with the Liceo orchestra in connection with the great Paris Exhibition, next year, when he also proposes to introduce his orchestra to London audiences.

Prague.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah," which had not been heard in Prague for many years, was recently performed by the German Tempel-Gesangverein, under the direction of Herr Richard Taussig, and with the co-operation of the orchestra of the German theatre. The rendering, which was a very efficient one, was greatly appreciated by a numerous audience.

Rheims.—The Cathedral was crowded on the occasion of the first performance, on the 11th ult., of Pope Leo XIII.'s Ode, "The Baptism of Clovis," celebrating in stirring Latin verse the christening and reign of the first Christian King of France, and set to music by M. Théodore Dubois, the director of the Paris Conservatoire, who conducted.

Rome.—Wagner's "Die Walküre" was produced for the first time at the Costanzi Theatre, on April 27, with great success. Madame Adini was the Brünnhilde, Signor Marchi the Siegmund, and Signor Pessina an excellent Wotan. Signor Ferrari conducted.——A new oratorio, "La Passione di Cristo," by the Maestro Cesare Pascucci, was produced last month at the Sala Palestrina and received with much favour.

Venice.—A commemorative tablet has recently been placed on the Palazzo Erizzo, where, on July 24, 1686, the celebrated musician and poet Benedetto Marcello was born.

Vienna.—Gluck's "Orpheus" was revived with great success at the Imperial Opera on April 28, with Frl. Charlotte Hahn, of Dresden, in the part of Euridice; that lady being also much appreciated in her subsequent assumption of the rôle of Brangäne, in "Tristan und Isolde."——Don Lorenzo Perosi has been presented with a very handsome baton by some of his admirers in this capital. It is said, however, that the recent Viennese performances of Perosi's oratorios have resulted in a deficit of some 16,000 florins.——A contingent of the celebrated Moscow Synodal Choir (twenty-three boys and seventeen men), under the direction of M. de Orlof, gave a concert here recently, causing quite a sensation by the wonderful sonority of their voices and admirable a capella singing of a number of hymns and canticles appertaining to the orthodox church. The presence of the choir in Vienna was owing to the inauguration here of a new Russian Church.

OBITUARY.

Miss Nessie Goode, whose painfully sudden death took place on April 3, was one of Signor Randegger's earliest pupils at the Royal Academy of Music, where she carried off the first "Parepa-Rosa Prize," and where she had a distinguished career as a vocalist and pianist, having been, in the latter department, a pupil of Mr. Walter Macfarren. In the seventies Miss Nessie Goode's name appeared frequently in concert programmes in London and the provinces, and in later years she had been extensively engaged as a teacher of singing. Her early demise is a source of deep regret to a large circle of friends and admirers.

We regret to record the death of Mr. John Hele, the Borough organist of Plymouth, which took place in that town on April 28, after a long and painful illness. Born in Plymouth, May 24, 1846, Mr. Hele became a student of the Royal Academy of Music, of which institution he was an Associate. He took the degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford in 1871. He was organist successively of several churches in and around Plymouth, and also of Bodmin Parish Church and Morden, Surrey. In 1883 he was appointed organist to the Borough of Plymouth, where his loss will be severely felt, and in October, 1896, he gave his 2,000th public recital.

Mr. Charles John Bond Andrews, a composer of several operas and songs, a string quartet, a pianoforte trio, &c., died suddenly in London, on April 27, at the early age of forty-two. Mr. Bond Andrews, who was a native of Birkenhead, was formerly known as an excellent pianist and as a conductor of touring operatic companies.

A distinguished musical amateur, the Count Luigi Francesco Valdrighi, died on April 20, at Modena, at the age of seventy-two. He was the possessor of a superb collection of musical instruments, ancient and modern (which, however, some time before his death he handed over to the Museum at Modena), an able musician, and the author of several valuable monographs, notably one entitled "Ricerche sulla Liuteria e Violineria modenese," and another entitled "Musurgiana," in which latter a description is given of a number of rare and little known antique instruments.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FRÄULEIN THERESE MALTEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—On p. 337 of your May issue I find the statement—"Fräulein Therese Malten, the original interpreter of the principal female rôle (in 'Die Folkunger'), again sang the part on the present occasion, though she has now practically retired from the operatic stage." As this erroneous statement is both unfair and misleading, I shall be greatly obliged if you will allow me, on the best authority, to contradict it in your columns.

Therese Malten has not retired from the Royal Opera, Dresden; did she think of doing so, her loss would be felt as a calamity. How much she is valued by the management is proved by the fact that, two years ago, her contract was renewed for a further term of ten years, with the privilege of four months' leave every year to fulfil other engagements; and also by the fact that she has been more than ever in demand this season, and has been called upon to create new rôles.

Believe me, yours sincerely,
Kathleen Schlesinger.

[We much regret the error on the part of our Foreign Correspondent.—Ed., M.T.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Beckenham. — On April 25 the Beckenham Choral Society, assisted by the Orchestral Society, led by Mons. D. M. Trytel, gave a fine rendering of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus" in the Public Hall. Mr. G. F. Hall conducted with admirable judgment. The choruses were sung with refinement and dignity. The soloists, Miss Maggie Purvis, Miss Marie Hooten, Mr. J. Leyland, and Mr. Daniel Price, more than satisfied the large audience which assembled. Miss Arnott presided at the pianoforte.

Bexley Heath.—A successful rendering of Root and Bradbury's cantata "Daniel" was given in the Chapel Road Lecture Hall, on the 3rd ult., under the able conductorship of Mr. Campbell-Everden. The choir consisted of sixty voices and was accompanied by an efficient orchestra together with pianoforte and harmonium. Madame Ellen Lamb was quite successful in the part allotted to her as the Queen, whilst Mrs. Youngman, Mrs. Campbell-Everden, Messrs. Pye, Francis Adams, Clayton, Penn, and John Adams each did good service in their respective characters. The choir appeared to much advantage, evidently having been carefully trained. The hall was scarcely large enough for the audience which assembled. Miss F. Hide and Mr. Batchelor were accompanists on the pianoforte and harmonium.

Bishop's Stortford.—The first subscription concert of the Bishop's Stortford Musical Union took place, in the Great Hall, on April 26. The band and chorus, numbering 120, were under the able conductorship of Mr. A. Eaglefield Hull, the leader of the orchestra being Miss M. Mardon. A large audience assembled and a most promising commencement was made. Cowen's "St. John's Eve" was performed, the solos being well sung by Miss Emily Davies, Miss Mabel Rowe, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Daniel Price. Miss Constance Barrett ably presided at the pianoforte.

Boscombe.—The Pokesdown Choral Union, under Mr. R. W. Robson's efficient conductorship, gave its last concert of the season in St. John's Church Room, on the 1st ult. Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" and Harford Lloyd's "Hero and Leander" were given with great effect and high appreciation. The solos were beautifully rendered by Madame Kate Bensberg, Mr. G. A. Vanderbeeck, and Mr. Cyril Streatfield. Miss Birt rendered excellent service as accompanist. Mr. Robson is shortly to leave Bournemouth, and it is gratifying to learn that at a farewell social gathering the members of the Choral Union presented him with an illuminated address and a purse containing £13.

Camberley.—Dr. C. H. Lloyd's dramatic cantata "Hero and Leander" was successfully performed at the Drill Hall, by the Camberley and York Town Choral Society, on the 8th ult. The accompaniments were effectively rendered by a small amateur string band, pianoforte, and harmonium. Miss Lilian Foote sustained the part of Hero and Mr Reginald Chalcraft that of Leander. Mr. Arthur Lake conducted.

Cannock (Staffordshire).—The Cannock and district Choral Society gave a very praiseworthy rendering of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on the 4th ult., in the New Hall. The choruses were sung with precision and excellent tone, and the orchestra, led by Mr. Boot, played with commendable skill. The Rev. E. Buss conducted, Mr. A. B. Collins presiding at the pianoforte and Mr. James E. Stokes at the organ. The soloists, all of whom gave great satisfaction, were Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Alice Lakin, Mr. Shakespeare Robinson, and Mr. Edgar Archer. There was a large and enthusiastic audience.

Cape Town.—The opening performance of Sophocles' Tragedy of "Antigone" was given (in English) at the Opera House, on April 13, before a large audience, under the management of Messrs. Joseph Ashman and T. Barrow-Dowling. Mendelssohn's music for full band and chorus was rendered in a masterly manner under Mr. Dowling's direction.

Chard.—On April 27 the Chard Harmonic Society gave a highly satisfactory concert, under the able conductorship of the Rev. H. N. Dymond. Van Bree's "Ode to St. Cecilia's Day" and Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens" were performed, together with Rossini's Overture to "Tancredi" and Gounod's Overture to "Mirella." Miss Ethel Winn was the solo singer, Mr. Frank Ll. Bartlett led the orchestra, and Mr. F. G. Risdon presided at the pianoforte.

Cheltenham. — On the 2nd ult. the Cheltenham Festival Society presented its much esteemed conductor, Mr. J. A. Matthews, with a gratifying mark of respect and of appreciation of his untiring energies on behalf of the Society's prosperity. The gift was a solid silver bowl for flowers, and it was handed to him, in the name of the subscribers, by the Mayor. Mr. Matthews, in a few appreciative words, thanked the donors very warmly for their handsome gift.

Chichester.—At the Musical Society's concert, on April 24, Elgar's "Banner of St. George" was the principal feature in the programme. This melodious work, for chorus only, had proved very interesting to the members at the rehearsals, and was sung, under the efficient conductorship of Dr. Read, with considerable spirit and taste. The remainder of the programme consisted of part-songs, violin solos by Miss Henrietta Murkens, and songs by Madame Bertha Rossow.

Cirencester.—A successful concert, under the auspices of the Choral Society, was given at the Corn Hall on April 27. The band was led by Mr. E. G. Woodward, and Mr. A. H. Gibbons conducted. The chorus was well-balanced and sang with brilliancy and readiness. The compositions interpreted were Schubert's "Song of Miriam" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and their rendering reflected great credit on the class and the conductor. The soloists were Madame Bertha Rossow, Mrs. Forsyth Forrest, and Mr. Harry Stubbs.

Culham.—At the annual inspection of Culham College by Dr. McNaught, on the 10th ult., the students gave a very creditable performance of Prout's "Damon and Phintias," under the efficient direction of Mr. H. B. Hamer. At the end of the cantata Dr. McNaught expressed his pleasure at the way in which both soloists and chorus had attacked the work, and said that although he had heard the same work performed by at least half-a-dozen colleges this year, he had never heard it done better. There was a small orchestra composed of students, and the solos were admirably sung by the following: A. M. Johnson (Dionysius), E. A. Maidment (Damon), and E. Hallan (Phintias).

Dover.—On the 3rd ult. a very pleasing and satisfactory concert was given by the Dover Choral Union, in the Town Hall, before a crowded audience, when Sir Frederick Bridge conducted his "Flag of England" and Mr. H. J. Taylor (conductor to the Union) conducted Stanford's "The Revenge." The solos were artistically rendered by Miss Esmé Atherden, Miss Lucie Johnstone, and Mr. Montague Borwell. The band and chorus numbered 150 performers, the leader of the orchestra being Mr. E. W. Barclay.

Fenny Stratford.—The "May" concert included Spohr's "The Last Judgment," Schubert's "Song of Miriam" (with Lachner's orchestration), and selections from "St. Paul." The solos were taken by Miss Fanny Chetham, Mrs. Bailey, Mr. James Gawthrop, and Mr. Sam. Heath. Captain Levi conducted and the orchestra was ably led by Mr. T. J. Henley.

Gloucester.—The last concert of the season by the Choral Society was given in the Shire Hall on April 26. The names of the artists who took part are sufficient guarantee of the excellence of the programme. They were Madame Ella Russell, Miss Greta Williams, Miss Amy Carter, and Mr. Douglas Powell; Miss Maud Powell (violinist), Miss Gertrude Peppercorn (pianist), Miss Olive Kennett and Mr. Ernest Mead (reciters). The choir was heard with effect in Lee Williams's "If doughty deeds" and Smart's "Cradle song," under the direction of Mr. Franklin Higgs, and Mr. Ivor Morgan (in the absence of Mr. A. H. Brewer) deserves special mention for his admirable services as accompanist.

Gravesend.—The complimentary concert to Mr. R. Feaver Clarke, in recognition of his zealous labours as secretary to the Gravesend and Milton Choral Association during twenty-one years, took place at the New Public Hall, on the 17th ult. The artists who assisted were Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Watkin Mills; Mr. Philip Cathie (violin), and Mr. Charles Fry (reciter). Mr. Howard Moss accompanied, Mr. C. R. Green assisted at the organ, and Mr. Watson's String Band played some selections. An excellent programme was successfully carried out by the artists named, and the large audience present gave gratifying evidence of their sympathy with the objects of the concert and of the esteem in which Mr. Clarke is held.

Henley-on-Thames.—A special service was held on Ascension Day at Holy Trinity Church, when the anthem was Prout's 100th Psalm, which was admirably rendered. The solos were excellently sung by Master George Glasspoole (London Training School for Choristers), and Mr. J. H. Chalmers, the organist and choirmaster of the church, presided at the organ.

Huntingdon. — A very successful performance of Handel's "Samson" was given in the Corn Exchange, on April 29, during the tercentenary Oliver Cromwell celebrations of that week, by Mr. Frank Clark's Choral Class and a band under the able leadership of Mr. Rohen Clensy. Much credit is due to Mr. Clark for the pains he had taken and for the high standard of excellency attained by his singers. Dr. A. H. Mann conducted, Mr. G. H. Brown and Miss Ethel Clark presiding at the organ and pianoforte respectively. The soloists were Miss Adelaide Lamb, Miss Louise Burns, Mr. Henry Slaughter, and Mr. Sam. Heath. There was a crowded audience and all the performers gave great satisfaction.

Ilford.—The Ilford Choral Union and Orchestral Society gave a very successful concert, chiefly of English music, on April 27, in the Reading Room, to celebrate St. George's Day, when a special feature of the programme was Elgar's "The Banner of St. George." Miss Kate Frewer contributed several songs, and Mr. W. Burnett-Carter played the first movement of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. Miss A. Dyster accompanied, and Mr. A. Storr was an efficient conductor.

Ilfracombe.—At the Runnacleave Hall, on April 25, the Ilfracombe Choral Society gave a very satisfactory rendering of Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast." The band was led by Herr Carl Köpsel, and the conductor was Mr. J. T. Gardner. Mr. William Green sang the difficult tenor solo in splendid style. The whole concert reflected credit on all concerned.

Llandilo.—On April 25 a very successful performance of Elgar's "King Olaf" was given at the Victoria Drill Hall, by the Llandilo Choral Society. The chorus accomplished its difficult task admirably. The soloists were Miss Ethel Wood, Mr. Gwilym Evans, and Mr. Ivor Foster, all of whom were quite successful in their respective parts. There was an efficient orchestra, under the leadership of Mr. W. F. Hulley, and Mr. R. C. Jenkins conducted.

Melbourne (Australia).—The Musical Society of Victoria held its monthly musical evening on March 25, in Glen's Concert Hall, when the programme was composed entirely of works by Coleridge-Taylor and Anton Dvorák. The hall was full, and the evening passed off very successfully. Much interest was evinced in Coleridge-Taylor's compositions. The Society is doing excellent work, and never before has it been so strong musically or financially. Mr. George Peak was the musical director.

Newtown.—The Harmonic and Orchestral Society gave an excellent performance of Haydn's "Creation" (Parts 1 and 2), followed by a suitable vocal and instrumental selection, in the Victoria Hall, on April 27. The soloists, Miss Emily Davies, Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys, and Mr. J. Sandbrook, were all highly efficient. The band (led by Mr. W. S. Stephenson) and chorus also did their work admirably. Miss Lilly Trow and Mrs. Kershaw presided at the pianoforte and organ, and Mr. J. C. Gittins ably conducted.

North Curry (Somersetshire).—At the Assembly Rooms the North Curry Choral Society gave a very creditable performance of selections from Handel's "Judas Maccabæus," on the 3rd ult. The solos were well sustained by Miss Mabel Morris, Mrs. Alfred Green, Mr. Theo. Taylor, and Mr. S. R. Chapman. The able conductor was Mr. S. C. Coombs, who is entitled to sincere congratulation for the efficient manner in which he has trained his chorus.

Northampton.—An important concert was given in the Corn Exchange, on April 29, in connection with the musical competition held in the Town Hall on the same day. The soloists were the Countess Valda Gleichen, the Hon. Norah Downey, Madame Emily Shinner, and Mr. Francis Harford. Mr. S. P. Waddington conducted and Mr. C. J. King accompanied. The festival was promoted principally by the Hon. Mrs. C. R. Spencer and several of her friends, for the encouragement of musical culture in the county.. The judges were Miss Wakefield and Mr. Arthur Somervell. The village of Long Buckby gained first honours in the round for children, the action song, and in the part-song competition for village choirs and choral societies; Dallington, conducted by the Hon. Mrs. Spencer, won the madrigal prize; and Piddington won in the hymn-singing competition. The competing choirs, numbering 300 voices, sang at the concert in the evening two choruses from "The Messiah," conducted by Mr. S. P. Waddington. The prizes were also distributed during the interval at the concert. As this is the first year of this musical festival its great success augurs well for the future.

Portland.—The Portland Vocal Association gave its final concert of the season on the 17th ult., in the Jubilee Hall, when Smart's "Bride of Dunkerron" was performed. The soloists were Mrs. de Méric, Mr. Moyes (Salisbury Cathedral), and Mr. Robinson. The work received a thoroughly good rendering — soloists, band, and chorus acquitting themselves with marked efficiency. At the conclusion of the concert the conductor, Mr. Matthews Loan, was presented by the members of the Society with a handsome baton and brass music stand, as a mark of the esteem in which he is held, and as a memento of the efficient state to which he has brought the Society.

Quorn (Leicester).—The Quorn Musical Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Vincent Dearden, gave a highly satisfactory performance of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," in the Village Hall, on the 10th ult. The chorus sang with praiseworthy precision and fine intonation, while the orchestra, led by Herr Karl Johannessen, played with taste and refinement. The solos were well sustained by Mrs. Russell, Miss Florence Adcock, Mr. Alfred Page, and Mr. Ll. H. Parsons.

Shortlands.—At a concert on the 10th ult. the Shortlands Choral Society, assisted by a small professional orchestra, gave an uncommonly good rendering of Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore," upon which the conductor, Mr. W. Bentham Martin, may well be congratulated. To Miss Jeannie Kirby for her work at the pianoforte and to Mr. Norman Bath, the able leader of the strings, praise is also due. Gade's "Spring's Message" and Elgar's chorus "It comes from the misty ages" were included in the programme. Songs were contributed by Mr. Horace Falls, a baritone of more than average promise, and violoncello solos were played by Mr. T. Weist-Hill with masterly effect. Mr. F. W. Partridge accompanied the songs.

Sidcup.—A highly successful performance of Leoni's "The Gate of Life" was given by the Sidcup Musical Society on the 8th ult., under the direction of Mr. Alfred E. Butterworth. The soloists were Miss K. Washington, Mr. J. R. J. Johnson, and the Rev. Bryan F. Browning. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous and special mention must be made of the harp and pianoforte duet "Concertstück" (Wilm), rendered by Mrs. and Mr. J. Connah, and also the violoncello solo by the latter of Goltermann's Andante.

Sittingbourne.—On April 26 the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society gave a very successful concert in the Town Hall, under the able direction of Mr. H. W. Chester. Gade's "Spring's Message" and Waddington's "John Gilpin" were performed. The chorus and orchestra numbered 110 performers, and the orchestra was led by Corporal Vicary, R.E.

Surbiton.—On April 29 Mr. Joseph Ivimey gave an orchestral concert in the Assembly Rooms, before a crowded audience. The band, largely composed of amateurs, included the members of both Mr. Ivimey's Surbiton and Weybridge orchestras, and played exceptionally well. The programme included the grand march from Wagner's "Tannhäuser"; the second movement from Beethoven's Sixth Symphony, in F major; Saint-Saëns's Symphonic Poem; Tschaïkowsky's "Casse Noisette" Suite; Mendelssohn's "Ruy Blas" Overture; Rossini's Overture to "William Tell," and a selection from Wagner's "Lohengrin." There were two vocalists—Miss Muriel Foster and Mr. A. Blagrove—both of whom were much appreciated.

Teddington.—A concert was given by the Teddington Philharmonic Society, on the 1st ult., which brought to a close a very successful season. The programme included the first performance of a musicianly setting of A. H. Clough's poem, "Say not the struggle naught availeth," for chorus and organ, which was well received. The second part consisted of a spirited performance of Bennett's "May Queen." The soloists were Miss G. M. Toxley, Mrs. J. W. Alcock, Mr. Malcolm Boyle, and Mr. Bertram Mills, who ably sustained their several rôles. The accompaniments throughout were in the skilful hands of the Misses Davenport (pianoforte) and Mr. D. A. Fox (organ). Mr. Randulph Coward conducted with his usual ability.

Wellington (New Zealand).—An important event took place during the recent Passiontide season, in the performance at St. Paul's Pro-cathedral of a selection from Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion. The recitatives for tenor and bass were reverently and finely sung by Dr. Kington Fyffe and Mr. John Prouse, and the choral movements were given with something more than technical accuracy. Mr. Robert Parker presided at the organ. On Palm Sunday Stainer's "The Crucifixion" was sung as the anthem at evensong, Mr. Douglas Jackson and Mr. Prouse being the soloists.

West Tarring.—On the 17th ult. the West Tarring Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Barnby's "Rebekah," in the Parish Church, Mr. W. Binstead conducting. The orchestra was led by Mr. P. Baker. The soloists were Mrs. Bernard Lees, Mr. T. H. Moppett, and Mr. A. Puttock.

Worthing.—The Choral Society's final concert of the season took place in the Theatre on April 26, when the chief feature of the programme was Mendelssohn's "Athalie." The orchestra, which consisted of Dr. Sawyer's

Orchestral Society at Brighton (led by Mr. Crapps), was thoroughly efficient, and the chorus, numbering seventy voices, sang with precision and vigour under the able direction of the conductor, Mr. F. D. Carnell. The solo parts were excellently sung by Miss Edith Serpell, Miss Elsie Macmillan, and Miss Eda Chaplin, a clever pupil of Mr. Carnell. The verses were recited by Mr. Charles Fry, who subsequently gave with much power the "Dream of Eugene Aram," with Mackenzie's music, in the second part of the concert, which was miscellaneous, Dr. Sawyer (who assisted at the organ in "Athalie") conducting the orchestra in several instrumental pieces.

Wrexham.—A very creditable rendering of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus" was given in Chester Street Baptist Church, on the 9th ult., by the choir of the church, under the able conductorship of Mr. J. Owen Jones. The choruses were well sung, as were also the solos by Miss M. Jones, Mr. R. Price, and Mr. Robert Jones. Mr. J. L. Williams presided at the pianoforte and Mr. Alfred Prince at the organ.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. James A. Crapper, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Bathgate, N.B.—Mr. W. A. Macduff, Organist and Director of the Choir to St. Paul's Church, Brighton.—Mr. William S. Preston, Organist and Choirmaster to Kelvinhaugh Parish Church, Glasgow.—Mr. Leonard C. F. Robson, to Ilford Congregational Church.—Mr. D. C. Walker, Organist and Choirmaster to Elder Park Parish Church, Govan, Glasgow.

Choir Appointments.—Mr. Robert Heaps, Lay Vicar (Alto) to Salisbury Cathedral.—Mr. Sam Fielder (Bass) to Chichester Cathedral.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

H. M. C. M.—The well-known version of "As pants the hart" (Spohr) was made by the late James Stimpson, of Birmingham, who re-arranged the music of the solo and chorus "Though all thy friends prove faithless," from "Calvary," and adapted to it the first two stanzas of the Tate and Brady metrical version of Psalm 42. The version of the words of "Calvary" used at St. Andrew's Church, Wells Street, is by Miss Etheldreda Webb, daughter of the late Rev. Benjamin Webb. "Calvary" was performed at the Novello concert on February 1, 1887, and at the Hereford Musical Festival, September 10, 1891.

A. J. C.—Suggested metronome rates. Grieg's Sonata (Op. 13): First movement, Lento, ♩ = 46, Allegro, ♩ = 176; second movement, ♩ = 126; third movement, ♩ = 168. Lipinski's Violin Concerto "Militaire" (Op. 21): First movement, ♩ = 144; second movement, ♩ = 100; third movement, ♩ = 152. Gavine's Study, No. 7: Grave, ♩ = 58; Allegro, ♪ = 138.

A. M.—The tune, to "Art thou weary?" that you send, is by the Rev. Dr. E. W. Bullinger. You will find it in the "Congregational Sunday School Hymnal," No. 414. The other tune, to "Come, gracious Spirit, heavenly Dove," is to be found in "The Hymnary," No. 549. It there appears in a slightly different form in regard to its melody from your transcript, and the tune has probably been reharmonised. It is designated "French Melody," but we have seen it attributed to Léfèbure-Wély.

Omega.—The theme of Schubert's Impromptu in B flat (Op. 142, No. 3) is in simple binary form. It is true that this is called by many writers "two-part Song-Form," or "Lied (song) Form." But, as Professor Prout says, "the best plan is to use the comprehensive term 'Binary'"; this is probably the view that the examiner took.

D. J. T.—Theorists differ so considerably upon the subject of "False relation" that it is not possible to dogmatise on such a controversial point. But we venture to think that the specimen you send is a "false relation."

A. T. A.—Lemare's Pastorale in E; Mendelssohn's Andante in D with variations; S. S. Wesley's Larghetto in F sharp minor; Kullak's Pastorale in F; Gade's Allegretto in C; Liszt's arrangement of "Ave Maria d'Arcadelt"; and Guilmant's Canzone in A minor. These pieces may answer your requirements.

Musical Student.—The following rates of speed may be adopted (approximately) for Weber's Sonata in C (Op. 24): Allegro, ♩ = 152; Adagio, ♩ = 88; Menuetto, ♩ = 192; Rondo, ♩ = 176.

Argus.—The following cantatas may suit your requirements:—"The Holy Child," "The Rainbow of Peace," "The Cross of Christ," all by Thomas Adams; "The Daughter of Jairus," Stainer; "Rebekah," Barnby; and "Seedtime and Harvest," John E. West.

"Esse quam videri."—The Laryngoscope may be obtained through any chemist. There are at least nine different kinds of the instrument, ranging in price from 30s. to £2.

A. B.—The Scherzo in E flat minor (Op. 4) by Brahms may be played about 𝅗𝅥. = 116.

Lancastrian.—Address "The Secretary, National Eisteddfod, Cardiff."

R. D. B.—We cannot give the names of teachers.

⁂ Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

NOVELLO'S
VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. I.

CONTAINING

100 SINGLE CHANTS.

NOVELLO'S
VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. II.

CONTAINING

50 DOUBLE CHANTS.

Price Sixpence.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. II., Chant No. 23, by Lord Mornington, which is included on account of its great popularity.

ODE TO THE PASSIONS

BY

WILLIAM COLLINS

SET TO MUSIC FOR CHORUS AND ORCHESTRA

BY

FREDERIC H. COWEN.

Vocal Score, Price Two Shillings.

String Parts (in the Press); Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.

THE TIMES.

Passages of delicate grace are admirably contrasted with more vigorous scenes, and the massive harmonies of the closing invocation to music, with their skilful building-up of a really impressive climax, reach a level that the composer has most seldom attained before.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Cowen's "Ode to the Passions" was undoubtedly the success of the afternoon, and advanced another step towards acceptance as that which contains the element of greatness. Mr. Cowen was "called" and enthusiastically applauded. He deserved it.

MORNING POST.

This is undoubtedly one of the most remarkable works written by Mr. Cowen, or, for the matter of that, by any Englishman. The freshness of the themes, the masterly orchestration, the wealth of fancy and ingenuity of resource combine to render the Ode a work of great and enduring value.

DAILY MAIL.

Mr. Cowen's latest cantata is one of his best inspirations. From first to last the music is interesting, the melodies are bright and taking, and the composer shows his mastery of modern instrumental resource.

DAILY NEWS.

In many respects it shows the composer at his best, and as the Ode is not too long nor too full of difficulties, and, moreover, as it is notable for that melodic inspiration of which Mr. Cowen has the rarely bestowed gift, there is not much doubt that it will speedily become popular with choral societies.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

The score is graphic and picturesque, but not involved. . . . Of late years Mr. Cowen has given an expectant world nothing more characterised by his accustomed daintiness and grace, or, it may be added, more instinct with the force and impulse that, if displayed with equal skill on a larger canvas, might result in a majestic work, calculated to hold its own during a later generation.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

Mr. Cowen's Ode is a genuine success; indeed, I should be inclined to rank it above anything he has yet written for the concert-room. . . . Mr. Cowen's Ode was received with great enthusiasm, and must be counted one of the great successes of the festival.

GLOBE.

Mr. Cowen's work deserves nothing but unlimited praise. . . . Short as the Ode is, it is a little masterpiece, and should prove one of the most lasting successes of the week.

THE GUARDIAN.

Mr. Cowen has seldom been more happily inspired. The charming sylvan scene and the broad and flowing strains of the Invocation to Music are passages of very remarkable merit well deserving the success attained.

STAINER & BARRETT'S DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL TERMS

REVISED AND EDITED BY
SIR J. STAINER,
M.A., Mus.D., Oxford; Hon. D.C.L. and Mus. Doc., Durham.

PREFACE.

The only way in which the Editor of a book of reference can show his gratitude to the public for demanding new editions on the exhaustion of the old, is by doing his best to keep its contents up to date. The reviser has done so; many articles have been entirely re-written or enlarged—e.g., Copyright and Licensing, Madrigal, Mass, Opera, Pianoforte, Pitch, and many of those little slips which show such persistent survival in works of this kind have been removed. The Editor is grateful to many, whose names are among the authors and helpers, for their share in this last revision.

CARACTACUS

A CANTATA

For Soprano, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass Soli, Chorus, and Orchestra

THE WORDS WRITTEN FOR MUSIC BY

H. A. ACWORTH, C.I.E.

THE MUSIC BY

EDWARD ELGAR.

Vocal Score, Price Three Shillings and Sixpence.

Paper boards, 4s.; cloth, gilt, 5s.; String Parts (in the Press); Full Score and Wind Parts, MS.; Vocal Parts, each 1s. 6d.

THE TIMES.

Mr. Elgar's music has the inestimable merit that it seldom, if ever, conveys even a momentary suggestion of any other composer's work. All that he has to say is his own. . . . In some respects the representative themes, of which there are quite a formidable number, are treated with great skill and originality, and as each scene is worked up to its logical climax, so the series grows in interest up to the most beautiful point in the composition, a "lament" in which the voice of the defeated king is supported by the choir in a movement of such poignant expression and such sincerely-felt emotion that the fact of its being in the strange rhythm of seven crotchets in a bar is quite forgotten.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

In "Caractacus" we find music that interests no less deeply than it charms, and for the most part these two qualities run side by side. . . . For the present I can do no less than offer sincere compliments to an English composer who speaks with so strong and commanding a voice.

THE STANDARD.

In "Caractacus" we have a work of which it may be said without the slightest hesitation that it is one of the greatest honours to English musical art that has been produced for many years. The wealth of melody in the score from the first bar to the last never fails, and it is ever fresh and unlaboured.

DAILY MAIL.

The cantata was received with enthusiasm and at the close the composer was recalled. The work is at once modern and original. There is a wealth of melody, and the barbaric grandeur of the triumphal procession through the streets of Rome is worthy of a Berlioz or a Wagner.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Elgar obviously knows how to interest the general public without sacrificing a whit of his musicianship. He is a melodist and a master of picturesque orchestral writing, while his choral workmanship, without being pedantic, is usually highly effective.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.

Mr. Elgar's musical personality is one to reckon with as a fact in art. He is academic in the excellent sense that he allows a real character, a genuine temperament, to be guided by the influence of the best masters; and he is wise to keep himself free from personal eccentricities, while at the same time fully giving the rein to his personal accomplishments. The result is that we get something so new in English music that one naturally hails it with respect and avowed expectation.

YORKSHIRE POST.

In the refreshing vigour of the music, the extraordinary grip of the orchestra, the mastery over all its resources, the keen appreciation of its colour, Mr. Elgar is quite supreme among our composers, and the freedom and force of his writing for the band are indeed remarkable. He is, however, not only capable of energetic effects, he can also give expression to extreme tenderness.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.
JULY 1, 1899.

HANS RICHTER.

"Look out, gentlemen, the semiquavers are coming." Such is the reputed utterance of Sir George Smart when that worthy knight was superintending a Philharmonic rehearsal in the second decade of the present century. In those days the baton was practically unknown in England. The conductor (so-called) seated himself at the pianoforte with a score, probably a pianoforte score, in front of him, from which he would play "with the orchestra at his pleasure," which, as Spohr very truly observed, "had a very bad effect." The real conductor was the first violinist, designated "the leader." This gentleman, when he was not semiquaverously engaged, "gave the beat with the bow of his violin." It may be reasonably assumed that this unmethodical method not infrequently caused "the leader" to misconduct—not himself, but the orchestra. The years 1832-33 witnessed a great change in the practice of conducting an orchestra in this country. The baton was then permanently introduced at the Philharmonic concerts and at the Opera; and from that time the wielder of the stick took his place at a separate desk in the manner with which we are now familiar. There is no need to enlarge upon the history of the introduction of the baton into England as a time-beating wand; those who care to pursue the subject will find it treated from documentary evidence—the accuracy of which has not been disputed—in The Musical Times of June, 1896. No useful purpose would be served by instituting a comparison between the conductors of bygone days and those of the present time. It will be more profitable, and certainly more interesting to take a few glimpses into the life and work of the great conductor whose fame has reached even unto the ends of the earth.

Hans Richter was born at Raab, in Hungary, April 4, 1843. Raab, about midway between Vienna and Buda Pesth, is a busy town of some 25,000 inhabitants, on the influx of the Raab into the Little Danube. Although its manufactures are chiefly tobacco and cutlery, it possesses a beautiful Cathedral.

PARENTAGE.

Half-a-century ago this said Cathedral of Raab was the fortunate possessor of a clever Domcapellmeister and organist, Anton Richter by name, the father of the subject of this biographical sketch. In his early days he sang in the Chapel of Prince Esterhazy, a name inseparably and worthily associated with dear old Papa Haydn. "All my family, including my grandfather, were musicians," says Dr. Richter, "except one, who was an organ-builder." (This is not to be taken as a reflection upon the organ-building fraternity, but a mere differentiation of the strictly professional aspect of the designation.) Anton Richter was an excellent and widely-read musician. "He had a good bibliothek (library)," recalls his distinguished son, "which included Berlioz's treatise on Instrumentation. My father composed a Requiem Mass without violins in the accompaniment. A Nonet by him, for strings and four wind instruments, was performed before the Queen of England at one of her private concerts. My father, who became paralysed, died in January, 1854, when I was nearly eleven years old." Anton Richter was in active intercourse with the leading musicians of his time. He enjoyed the intimate friendship of Otto Nicolai, who was for a long time his guest, and while at Raab he wrote a great part of his celebrated opera "The Merry Wives of Windsor." Liszt was also a frequent visitor, and Dr. Richter's earliest recollection of the great pianist was when he jumped him up in the doorway of the room and bumped his head in the process.

Many men who have made their mark in life will attribute no small measure of their success to that influence which is the special as well as the natural prerogative of a mother. So it is with Hans Richter. "She led me the way to Wagner," he says. And here it must be recorded that Frau Richter (née Josephine Csazinsky) was a distinguished soprano singer in her day. She took the part of Venus in Wagner's "Tannhäuser" at the first performance of the opera in Vienna, in October, 1857. In later years she became a most successful teacher of singing in Vienna. She published a "school" for the voice, which was founded on such an excellent basis that it attracted the notice of the great scientist Helmholtz, who was so satisfied with his investigation of Frau Richter's method that he wrote a letter to her giving it his strong approval. She lived to witness the triumphs of her son Hans, and died full of years and honour October 20, 1892, aged 70.

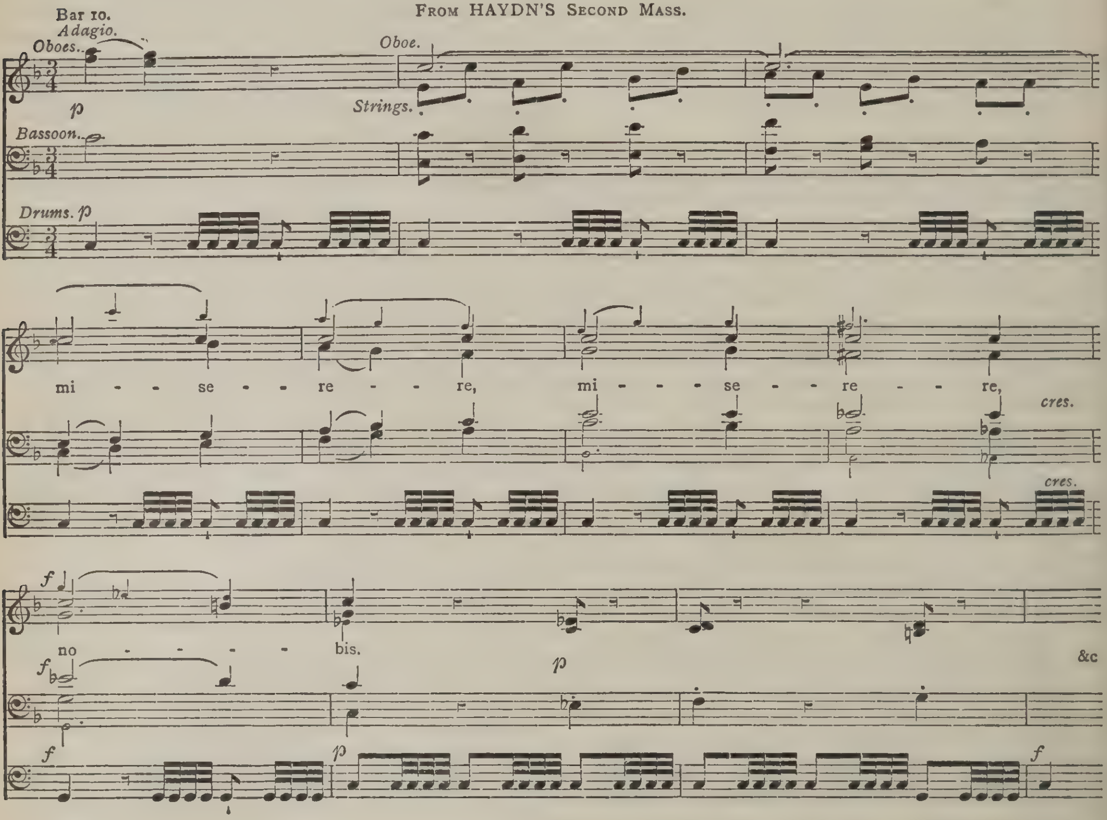
HANS RICHTER THE BOY DRUMMER.

Thus it has been shown that Hans Richter was reared in an atmosphere of music. He naturally received his first lessons in the art from his father. He sang in the Cathedral choir, either as a soprano or alto, as was required of him, and when his legs were long enough he played the organ, an instrument for which he showed decided talent. His first appearance in public took place when he was only seven years old. Not, be it noted, as a singer, or as an organist, but as a performer on an instrument characteristic of that all too rare attribute in others, but which runs through his blood—rhythm. "The melody is the flesh," he says, "but the rhythm is the bones!"

"Haydn's Mass in C (No. 2 of Novello's edition) was to be performed in the Cathedral of Raab. It is known in German-speaking countries as the "Pauken-Messe," by reason of the prominent part for the drums in the Agnus Dei.* Here is the passage that the seven-years-old Hans played—and played, we may add, "to his father's complete satisfaction":—

AGNUS DEI.

From HAYDN'S Second Mass.



EARLY YEARS.

In the spring of 1853, at the age of 10, Hans made his appearance at a concert given by his mother, when he played the pianoforte part in Hummel's Quintet in E flat. Soon after his father's death (in 1854) the boy was sent to Vienna, and became a pupil of the Löwenburg Convict or school, where Franz Schubert received his education. Another boy, who has also become a distinguished conductor, Josef Sucher by name, entered the school on the same day as Richter. The Convict supplied the chorister boys for the Court Chapel. In the choir of this Imperial sanctuary Richter sang for four years. The solo quartet at that time consisted of Sucher (soprano), Richter (alto), Erl (tenor), and Staudigl—the great Staudigl (bass).

HORN PLAYER IN THE ORCHESTRA.

From 1860 to 1865 Richter was a student in the Conservatorium at Vienna. His principal study was the violin under Heissler. Harmony and counterpoint he studied with Simon Sechter, one of the most distinguished of theorists, from whom Franz Schubert even intended to take some lessons had his life been spared. Young Richter had to make his own way in the world and to get his own living. He knew that there were fiddlers enough and to spare, therefore he wisely took up as his second study, under Kleinecke, the horn, as having "the best chance of all the instruments." It speaks well for his industry and steadfastness of purpose that only nineteen months after his first lesson on "the most human instrument in the orchestra" he was appointed (on May Day, 1862) to be one of the horn players in the band of the Kärnthnerthor Theater, now the Imperial Opera House. It is true that his pay was about £3 per month, but it was a start. And the consequences! In the meantime he had brilliantly passed an examination in conducting, his examiners being Heinrich Esser and Franz Lachner.

---

* The Mass was composed by Haydn in 1796, "In tempore belli"—i.e., at the time of the war between Austria and France.

WAGNER'S COPYIST.

Richter did not long continue to remain a member of the Imperial Opera band. During his four years' service as "one of the horns" he specially attracted the attention of Esser, with results that exercised a wonderful influence upon his (Richter's) future career. At that time there was a certain composer living in close retirement in Switzerland named Richard Wagner, who had just completed an opera named "Die Meistersinger." The composer wrote to Esser at Vienna, saying, in effect: "Can you send me some reliable young fellow who would copy out the score of my new opera for the printer?" "Yes," replied Esser; "I can highly recommend Hans Richter, a horn player in my orchestra." In the month of October, 1866, Richter left Vienna and took up his abode under Richard Wagner's roof at Triebschen, near Lucerne. How little the young horn player of twenty-three summers could have realised the momentousness of the step he was taking in responding to this unsought invitation of Richard Wagner.

TRIEBSCHEN, WITH WAGNER.

Richter arrived at Triebschen in October, 1866. He was installed in a room on the upper storey of Wagner's villa. During the first three months he was absolutely alone; he even took his meals in solitude. Wagner's study was immediately underneath Richter's apartment. Wagner used to work undisturbed all the morning: he was then engaged upon the "Meistersinger." When he had finished a page of the score he would bring it up to Richter, often with the ink still wet, for him to copy. On one occasion—and it was only one—Wagner asked Richter's advice upon a technical point in instrumentation. He brought up to his copyist's room a freshly written sheet of the Finale of the second act of "Die Meistersinger," where the horn takes up the theme of Beckmesser's Serenade. Said Wagner: "Do you think that this phrase can be performed on the horn at so rapid a tempo? Is it not too difficult?" Richter replied: "Certainly it can be played; but it will sound very queer and nasal." "Capital!" said the composer, "that is exactly what I meant it to be. It is sure to have a comic effect." Richter had then and there to get his horn and play the passage several times over, more and more quickly. Wagner was delighted at having obtained the exact effect that he intended.

(By kind permission of Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co.)
WAGNER'S VILLA AT TRIEBSCHEN.

On summer evenings Richter, with his horn as a companion, would take a boat on Lake Lucerne and row off to a small island opposite the villa. Here, hidden amongst the long grass and undergrowth, he used to play on his favourite instrument until he was out of breath. These mysterious strains were wafted to the opposite shore, to the bewilderment of the listeners, who, as they could not see the performer, were puzzled as to the source from whence the music came. At last an enterprising Englishman determined to solve the mystery. He rowed out to the island and, upon discovering the secluded hornist, this son of Albion said: "At last I have found you! It is you, then, that has been playing that wonderful music. Let me thank you, sir, for the pleasure you have given me on so many evenings." Fifteen years afterwards (in 1885) Richter was at Oxford to receive the honorary degree of Doctor in Music. On that occasion a member of the University came up to him and, after a cordial greeting, reminded the newly-made Doctor that he was the discoverer of a certain horn player at Triebschen, and he then recalled the pleasant memories associated with that curious incident. "Well," replied Dr. Richter, "it was indeed an experience worth remembering; for you can say that you were unquestionably the first to hear selections from the 'Meistersinger'!"

WAGNER'S METHOD OF COMPOSING.

Part of Richter's "daily round" at Triebschen was to accompany Wagner on his long walks. These afternoon constitutionals were of an absolutely silent nature. Not a word was spoken. Every evening, however, Wagner would read aloud. At that time Hoffmann's stories were in great favour, and these he read in an incomparable manner and with the greatest animation. During the whole of his thirteen months' sojourn under Wagner's roof, Richter never once heard the sound of a pianoforte in the Master's workroom. Every one of those complicated scores was conceived in that wonderful brain, even to the smallest detail, and apparently without effort. Moreover, Wagner never altered anything. Every bar became a finished production in that genius mind before it was placed on paper.

AS AN OPERA SINGER.

In December, 1867, at the request of Hans von Bülow, then conductor of the Royal Opera House at Munich, Richter settled in the Bavarian capital. The "Meistersinger" was then being prepared for its initial performance under Bülow. Richter was appointed chorus-master, and, with his unique knowledge of the score, it is hardly necessary to say that his assistance at the numerous rehearsals was invaluable. The first performance of the "Meistersinger" took place at Munich on June 21, 1868. Bülow conducted, but Wagner personally supervised everything. At twelve o'clock on the morning of the sixth performance (July 16, 1868), Bülow came to Richter and said: "Fischer (Kothner) is quite hoarse. If no singer can learn the part we must give up the performance to-night." "I will sing it," promptly replied Richter, and he did! In recalling the incident Dr. Richter quietly observes: "I could have sung every part." He successfully accomplished his self-imposed task in a manner that drew from Wagner the following appreciation: "That you acted and sang Kothner with earnestness and conscientiousness did not in the least surprise me."

FIRST CONDUCTORSHIP.

On August 25, 1868, at the age of twenty-five, Hans Richter made his first appearance in public as a conductor. The place was the Hof- und National Theater, Munich, to the conductorship of which he had been appointed—the opera was "William Tell." In the following year (1869) preparations were made at the Royal Opera, Munich, for the production of Wagner's "Das Rheingold." As Bülow had resigned the post of conductor, the duty of preparing the work fell upon Richter. "It is not all Rheingold that glitters," wrote Mr. J. W. Davison thirty years ago, and it is quite certain that the first section of Wagner's "Der Ring des Nibelungen" was not launched upon smooth waters. It is unnecessary to enter into all the circumstances that led to Dr. Richter's resignation, beyond stating the fact that he very properly refused to conduct the first performance of a work that had been so indifferently prepared so far as its mise-en-scène was concerned. However, a general rehearsal of "Das Rheingold" took place on August 27, 1869. Amongst the privileged spectators present on that occasion was Mr. C. A. Barry, one of Dr. Richter's oldest English friends. And this circumstance derives special interest from the fact that Mr. Barry was the first writer in an English newspaper to acknowledge Dr. Richter's great gifts as a conductor. "C. A. B." thus wrote in the Guardian of September 9, 1869:—

> Herr Hans Richter conducted. Though but quite a young man, he is said to have a practical knowledge of every instrument employed in the orchestra; as a conductor he has certainly especial talent, and, as was fully proved by their playing, had drilled the band to a remarkable state of efficiency.

WAGNER, BACH, AND BEETHOVEN.

Having resigned his post at Munich on September 1, 1869, Richter went to Paris, and from there to Brussels, where, on March 22, 1870, he conducted the first performance of "Lohengrin" in the French language. June found him once again at Triebschen, under Wagner's roof, in order to make a fair copy of the "Ring des Nibelungen" for the engraver. He recalls the interesting duet-playing he enjoyed with Wagner at that time. Bach was their composer; and two or three times a week Wagner and Richter played together four-hand arrangements of the great Cantor's motets, the organ fugues, and the "48." Every Saturday there was a Beethoven quartet practice. The players were Kahl and Rauchenegger (first and second violins), Hans Richter (viola), and Ruhoff (violoncello). These practices were most carefully supervised by Wagner, who gave valuable directions to the players in regard to phrasing, nuances, &c. Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" belongs to this period. Its composition and projected performance were kept a profound secret. Richter used to go over to Zurich to rehearse the players. "I can't think why Richter has become so idle lately," said Madame Wagner, "he used to be so industrious. Now he is so often going to Zurich." The "idleness" was accounted for when the surprise performance of the "Siegfried Idyll" took place on Madame Wagner's birthday, Christmas Eve, 1870. On that occasion Wagner conducted the little orchestra from Zurich, and Hans Richter ideally played the trumpet part.

BUDA PESTH AND VIENNA.

In April, 1871, Richter left Triebschen upon becoming Capellmeister of the Hungarian National Theatre, Buda Pesth. Here he remained for four years and gained much practical experience in operatic affairs; he also founded the Philharmonic concerts. He conducted the first performance of Liszt's "Christus," in 1873. "Liszt was so very nice and so satisfied," he says. Again: "Liszt on the pianoforte and Stainer on the organ are the greatest performers I have known. I can never forget Sir John Stainer's playing in St. Paul's: it gave me so much pleasure." "No, pleasure is not the right word, something stronger than that."

But a greater sphere of work was in store for Richter. In January, 1875, he conducted a remarkable Wagner concert in Vienna in aid of the Bayreuth enterprise which attracted much attention. On May 1 he began his duties as Capellmeister at the Imperial Opera House there, and, in the following October, as conductor of the Philharmonic concerts in the Austrian capital. These important appointments he still holds, and it is hardly necessary to say that Dr. Richter is one of the most prominent musical personalities in Vienna.

BAYREUTH.

In 1875 were commenced the rehearsals for the renowned "Ring" performances given at Bayreuth in the following year. Wagner left the preparation of the music entirely in the trusted hands of his faithful Richter—the Master occupied himself wholly with the stage and its accessories. "For the first week or two of the rehearsals," says Dr. Richter, "no one seemed able to grasp the style of the music, and I began to think that it would be a failure; but during the fourth week the light began to dawn." There is no necessity to dwell upon the familiar theme of the Bayreuth festival of August, 1876. We venture, however, to reproduce the words of the special correspondent of THE MUSICAL TIMES having reference to Dr. Richter's share in that remarkable enterprise:—

> Herr Richter, of Vienna, filled the all-important post of conductor in a manner absolutely beyond reproach. I may say this the more emphatically, because I have never seen Herr Richter. He is known to me only "by his fruits," and assuredly never did music so exacting receive such ample justice. It may be urged that the completeness of the performance arose from a multitude of rehearsals. Of course it did—otherwise Herr Richter and his men would have wrought a miracle. The secret of their success, apart from individual skill, was simply hard work. Let me give particulars on this head. The orchestral rehearsals alone of the four dramas were thirty-six in number—nine for each drama, to say nothing of subsequent rehearsals more or less "full." Many of these lasted four hours, the "wind" occupying two hours and the strings the other two. . . . . "No wonder," it may be said, "that the result was perfect." The wonder is that, in our days of hurry, so much patient labour was thought needful and cheerfully bestowed."

Although Dr. Richter was invisible to the general public at Bayreuth, an English visitor who peeped behind the scenes says that he conducted in his shirt sleeves! "Yes," observes the great conductor, "and it has since become the fashion."

LONDON, 1877.

Dr. Richter paid his first visit to England in 1877, when, at the bidding of Wagner, he came to London to assist him in conducting the "Wagner Festival" held in the Royal Albert Hall during May, 1877. As a matter of fact, although the Meister was the nominal conductor, the actual work of directing the orchestra was carried out by his fidus Achates, Hans Richter. Wagner wrote to him: "For the accomplishment of my London scheme, you are indispensably necessary to me; yes, without your help, I really could not think of undertaking these concerts."

THE RICHTER CONCERTS.

These celebrated music-makings originated from the visit of Dr. Richter to London. The great conductor says: "Hermann Franke, an excellent artist and an estimable man, was really the founder of the 'Richter Concerts.' Franke suggested that I should come to England from time to time. I was delighted with the English musicians, and I told him that I should like to conduct concerts in London." The first Richter concert was given at St. James's Hall on May 5, 1879, though under the title of "Orchestral Festival Concerts." The programme included Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," the "Introduction to Act 3 of the 'Meistersinger,'" Schumann's "Manfred" Overture, and Beethoven's A major Symphony (No. 7). Frau Schuch-Proska and Mr. Henschel sang, and the orchestra of 110 performers was "led" by Herr Hermann Franke. One of the leading musical critics of the day, while not altogether approving of the "advanced" (or Wagnerian) nature of the music performed, gave unstinted praise to the conductor's supreme ability. Here are his words, which merit reproduction:—

> Herr Richter has not under him here, as at Bayreuth, the picked artists of an empire, nor has he had almost unlimited rehearsals. But he is one of the men who, in a certain sense, falsify the dictum that you cannot grow grapes on thorns. If Napoleon's presence with his troops was worth, as said Wellington, an army corps of 20,000 men, what is the value in an orchestra of this emperor of conductors? We cannot appraise it, but we can feel the influence of Richter's supreme mastery, of his all-embracing coup d'œil, of his perfect resource, and, not less, the confidence with which he must inspire his followers. Hans Richter is a "conductor" of a verity, and we are glad to have him amongst us as an example. Many of our own conductors have been sitting at his feet this week, and we trust the fidgetty among them will fidget less; the convulsive become calmer; the uncertain more assured; the feeble stronger; and, we had almost said, the led ones themselves take the lead, though that would, perhaps, be a change for the worse. As respects Herr Richter's reading of Wagner's music, nothing need be said after the experience of the "Wagner Festival," and, with reference to his treatment of Beethoven, we have chiefly to praise the discretion which avoids all forced interpretation. He brings out into fuller relief that which is obvious in the score, but he does not treat the great master's music as an obscure text given him for annotation and emendation. This is one of the Viennese conductor's greatest recommendations to us conservative English.

"Nowhere is there a better audience than in London," says Dr. Richter. "The London orchestral players are the best readers," he very emphatically asserts—"my colleagues," he calls them—"and I have been very glad to introduce new works by English composers at my concerts. I should like to mention how greatly I am indebted to Ernst Schiever, my first violin. There could be no better leader, he is most reliable and efficient. And then there is my chorus master, Theodor Frantzen, who is also excellent. He has prepared the chorus in the Ninth Symphony very often; Beethoven's Mass in D, four times; Brahms's Requiem, three times; the 'Schicksalslied'; the 'Rhapsodie' for contralto and men's voices; Bach's Magnificat; and Berlioz's 'Faust'—in fact, all the choral works which have been performed at the concerts. I don't know two better chorus masters than Frantzen and Stockley of Birmingham—both very good."

A RICHTER REHEARSAL.

Two rehearsals are held for each Richter concert—one on Saturday, the other on Monday, the morning of the concert. They take place in St. James's Hall, where the concerts are given, and last from 9.30 to 12.30. The rehearsals are strictly private, and the keen-eyed conductor would very quickly spy any stranger who happened to be present without his special permission. There is a business-like air about the whole proceeding—everything works smoothly, there is no fuss and no waste of time. The chief and his hundred players are met together to get through certain work, and their whole attention is concentrated upon its achievement; there is plenty of playing to be done, but no playing the fool. A story is told of a certain English conductor, one who has "crossed the bar," to the effect that during rehearsal one of the horn players purposely put a wrong crook on his instrument and played away! At the end of the movement the conductor said: "Yes, yes; pretty well," and then turning to the players on his right hand, he blandly added: "There was something a little wrong in the second violins, but it will be all right at the concert!" Such a trick—even in the form of a practical joke—could not be played upon Dr. Richter; he would very soon set straight any such jocose crookedness on the part of a horn or any other player.

It is evident from the outset that the orchestra, to a man, feel the supreme masterfulness of their conductor; he is "head and shoulders" above them, and they know it. One feature—and a very important one—is the silence and attention that are secured, quite naturally, it may be added, before a start or re-start is made. These significant silences, while the baton is held aloft, act as most effective thought-concentrators. A new work is first run straight through. Then various groups of instruments may be taken alone—the strings, wind, and so on. Much care is bestowed upon bowing and phrasing; and Dr. Richter does not hesitate to tap the beats on his desk in order to knock the time, so to speak, into his doughty men. He frequently sings a phrase, often very lustily, in order that his players may the more readily grasp his meaning. He says: "Wagner so often said 'my Capellmeister must be able to sing a phrase.'" Very little is said by the conductor; his gestures, though never obtrusive, speak louder than words. Perhaps there is a little want of attention. A sudden cessation of the beating, and the conductor's arms are folded. His dignified pose meets the eyes of the players as they discover that the baton is motionless. Not a word is uttered; the statuesque attitude is eloquent to a degree; and after a brief silent pause the baton is raised and the movement is re-started.

It is specially interesting to attend a Richter rehearsal when a new work by an English composer is being prepared for its initial performance—such, for instance, as the "Variations on an original theme for orchestra," by Mr. Edward Elgar. It is evident that the conductor has taken quite a fancy to these "Variations"—though, in justice to him be it said, he never relaxes his vigilant thoroughness in preparing any work, but still one can "read between the bars," so to speak. The minutest detail claims his serious attention. Various appeals are made to the composer as to the right tempi and any points that may tend towards a more perfect rendering. Even were it an offspring of his own brain he could not be more painstaking—whether it be in securing the airy lightness of "Dorabella" (the Intermezzo), or the impetuosity of "Troyte." An amusing observation in regard to the opening bars of the last-named variation is addressed to the drummer. "If you begin so loud, your crescendo will break your drum!" How few realize the importance of preparing for a crescendo. And how wonderfully Richter, with that great crescendoing "Ah - - -" of his, shows his men how to get the proper increase of tone. Many a valuable lesson may be learnt at a Richter rehearsal.

APPOINTMENTS AND DISTINCTIONS.

There is no necessity to dwell in detail upon the career of Dr. Richter during the last twenty years, since he has been in the habit of annually visiting England. Is it not known and read of all men? In 1885, without the least solicitation on his part, he was appointed conductor of the Birmingham Musical Festival in succession to the late Sir Michael Costa. In the same year (1885) he was created, honoris causâ, a Doctor in Music of the University of Oxford. The concerts that he has conducted in London and the provinces during these twenty years have been already referred to. Mention must, however, be made of the important series of Wagner operas conducted by Dr. Richter at Drury Lane in the year 1882, when two of the Bayreuth master's most characteristic works—"Die Meistersinger" and "Tristan und Isolde"—were given for the first time in England and with the greatest possible success.

In his own city (Vienna) Dr. Richter holds the following appointments: Erster K.K. Hofkapellmeister, Erster Hofoper Kapellmeister, Dirigent der Philharmonie Concerte, Ehrenmitglied der Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde. He has been the recipient of the following orders: Franz Josef, Red Eagle, White Falcon, Iron Crown, Bavarian Michael, Würtemberg, Mecklenburg, Weimar, Saxe-Coburg, Meiningen, and Russian. He is a Knight of Austria and Saxe-Coburg.

AN APPRECIATION BY ONE OF THE BAND.

An interesting and valuable side-light upon Dr. Richter has been kindly furnished, at our request, by the distinguished trumpet player, Mr. Walter Morrow, who has been a member of Dr. Richter's orchestra during the whole of the time that the concerts have been given in England, a period of twenty years. Mr. Morrow writes:—

"Yes, I am proud to say that I have been a member of Dr. Richter's orchestra since May 5, 1879, the date of his first concert in London. During this long period of twenty years I have seen many changes in the personnel of his orchestra. A number of his earlier players have departed this life, among them Svendsen, Trout, Ellis, Hurley, Geard, and Catchpole. All of these were highly esteemed by Dr. Richter—indeed, he esteems and is esteemed by every member of his band; or he makes them believe that he does, and this is a very great matter in the management of an orchestra.

"I perfectly remember the impression he made upon us orchestral players at his first rehearsal in St. James's Hall; his conducting was a revelation. His many high qualities stamped him at once in our minds as a Master conductor; an impression which time has not changed, but greatly strengthened. Some prophesied that he, being new to us, only showed his better side, and that time would unveil the objectionable side. This prophecy has not been fulfilled; he is the same Hans Richter, possessing the same grand qualities as of old.

"I have sometimes been asked to describe these qualities. It is difficult to enumerate them; they are felt, but cannot be adequately described. He has an imposing presence; a generous, genial manner; a wonderful self-command; a prodigious memory; a profound knowledge of scores; a practical knowledge of orchestral instruments, particularly the horn and trumpet—the technical difficulties of these two tender instruments are rarely understood. The players know how kindly and sympathetically Dr. Richter nurses them; at the same time he gets everything possible out of them.

"In conducting an orchestra Dr. Richter naturally beats time with a baton, and his beat is always unmistakable. But his power is not there, it is in his eye and in his left hand. What a wonderfully expressive left hand it is! And he seems to have every individual member of the band in his eye; he misses nothing, and we do not seem able to escape from the influence of that eye for a single moment. No mistakes occur without that influence being severely felt. At one concert I was under the impression that I had accomplished the feat of making a mistake which he did not detect. We were playing the Overture to the 'Flying Dutchman.' I let my thoughts wander for the moment and at one passage entered just one bar too soon. I only touched one note and stopped; the Doctor's eyes were on the second violins. I said to my colleague, 'He has not caught me this time.' The Doctor took no notice of me, and we finished the first part of the concert. During the interval my colleague and I were chatting together quite cheerfully, when I felt the touch of a hand on my shoulder, and heard the question: 'What happened in the "Dutchman," Mr. Morrow?' I magnanimously acknowledged that 'It was a little carelessness on my part, Doctor.' 'A little what?' he said. I repeated, 'It was a little carelessness.' This was a word he did not know, at least in English. He evidently thought it was some miserable subterfuge, for he walked away shaking his head and saying, 'No, no, it was a wrong note.'

"I know no conductor who can get so much out of orchestral players. At rehearsals he gets through a large amount of work, but there is never any friction, never any irritability or irritation. He stops a great number of times, but always for a satisfactory and well explained reason, and these explanations are often very amusing. The violoncelli, for instance, have a passage in "Tristan" which should be rendered with much warmth of expression; the rendering, however, though generally correct, is cold. This elicits the remark: 'Bravo, celli, quite correct, but you play like married people; a little more like the young lovers, please.'

"At the end of a three hours' rehearsal we disperse with the feeling that a great deal has been taken out of us, but that the operation has been pleasant and agreeable. At the close of a concert we realize that the strain has been very great; but the artistic renderings of the master works under Dr. Richter's baton, and the kind appreciative words he never fails to address to his orchestral players always arouse feelings of the greatest admiration and esteem for the greatest living conductor."

THE BIRTHPLACE OF HAYDN.

A Visit to Rohrau.

In the South of Austria, just within the frontier line which divides that country from its fellow State of Hungary, lies the village of Rohrau. The quiet little place, far removed from city din and bustle, is of a most retiring disposition. Even the iron steed, whose occasional visits keep it in touch with the busy outside world, so far humours its taste as to halt at a little distance from the village. Thus the traveller is compelled to take a ten minutes' trudge before he passes the little church and gains its main—or rather, only—street. But Rohrau, in size and political status not great, has had greatness thrust upon it. It is the birthplace of Haydn. And so it falls out that no less a personage than the Father of the Modern Symphony, who came as a "Son and Stranger" to the little Austrian village in the spring of 1732, is the one who has invested it with an honour and an interest that many a fair city might envy.

During a visit to Vienna last winter I was constantly haunted with the desire to pay a visit to this interesting spot and, if opportunity afforded, to take some photographs of the old homestead. But the Imperial City has much of a like interest to offer to the musician. Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert—these great tone-poets did not tread the streets of old Vienna without leaving many an association dear to their admirers. Here, the house in which Franz Schubert was born; there, the chamber in which the mighty Beethoven fought his long fight with death. Here, the babbling brook, upon whose banks Beethoven loved to sit and compose; and there, the lone cemetery, where the long unkempt grass waves over the mortal remains of Mozart. So the holidays slipped by, and my return only chronicled a resolution to make the pilgrimage at the first opportunity on my next visit to the Austrian capital. But the spring brought evil tidings to musicians. Fire had broken out in Rohrau! Still worse, the house "Zum Haydn" was the chief sufferer. It was even reported that the tablet built into the wall and the visitors' book only were saved. Therefore, on the occasion of my next sojourn in Vienna, a visit to Rohrau was likely to be of doubtful interest, if the matter had been rightly reported. A heap of blackened stones, all that remained, offered too sad a subject for contemplation.

But in talking over the matter with a friend —the kind and learned Dr. Mandyczewski, of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde—I learnt that the damage was not so great as was at first reported. Later accounts stated that the injury done was chiefly confined to the thatch and timber of the roof. A few days afterwards the above-named gentleman proposed a joint expedition in order to see for ourselves the true state of affairs. I accepted his invitation gladly, and thus one sunny May morning we set off, armed with a well-loaded camera, to visit the peaceful scenes that looked upon the child-life of Joseph Haydn.

THE ROOM IN WHICH THE VISITORS' BOOK IS KEPT.

(From a photograph by Frank Merrick.)

Upon entering the village, the first object that demands attention is the church. Here, in this peaceful God's acre, rest Matthias Haidn (sic) and his wife Maria, the father and mother of the composer. The grave, with its quaint monument, lies outside the church in an angle to the right of the doorway. We learn by it that the village wheelwright and sacristan was a person of some importance in the little community of Rohrau. He was also a magistrate. The mother was cook at the establishment of Count Harrach, whose château and park lie a short distance away. Many are the years that separate us from the time when the wheelwright cast eyes of love at the country maid of the kitchen. They courted, married, and had children. Frau Haydn died in 1754 and her lord and master in 1763. In the latter year Joseph was thirty-one. Thus the father knew comparatively little, and the mother scarcely anything, of the greatness of their second-born son, of his untiring devotion to the art of music, of the love and veneration which in future years should cling to his name. How little did they realise that strangers from all parts of the civilised world would be drawn to their humble abode because of the lustre which the genius of their son Joseph had shed upon it. Their resting-place, we are glad to notice, shows no sign of neglect or decay. The letters which tell us of the old folk are picked out clear and bright. To whose kind care is this due? To that of their affectionate son, whose greatness never caused him to forget the old home or its inmates. Amongst Haydn's bequests was one that made provision for this grave to be kept in good order.

Leaving the church and turning sharply to the right, we soon found ourselves in the heart of the village. A minute's walk along the old street brings us to the object of our visit, "Zum Haydn." It stands as of yore, a long, low, straggling house, presenting an extensive frontage, we might say, broadside to the road. Evidently building sites are not at a premium in Rohrau.

We gladly note that the walls remain standing; that the birth-room, the old kitchen, and the dwelling-room are uninjured. True, the strip of grass in front has disappeared. The picturesque thatched roof is gone, and gone for ever, too, for the law decrees that less inflammable material must replace the quaint-looking but dangerous straw covering. The workmen are busy making this necessary but regrettable change. They pause, however, as the camera is being adjusted, and obligingly pose themselves as the faithful plate records its impressions.

The large doorway in the front gives entrance to both the house and its back-yard. The charred and blistered woodwork of the door bears testimony to the recent disaster. Entering and turning to the left we come to the curious kitchen with its chimney corner and seats. This, as we learn from the composer himself, was the scene of his initiation into artistic life. The day's work over, here the wheelwright would sit with his wife and bairns, singing to his own accompaniment upon the harp. Frau Haydn would also at times contribute one or two old folk-songs. Little Franz Joseph, not to be left out of the music-making, would add an impromptu accompaniment performed on two pieces of wood, one representing a fiddle, the other doing duty for the bow. He had seen the village schoolmaster thus handle the violin. Of the quality, in regard to tone, of this part of the evening's entertainment we cannot speak with certainty. In all probability it was decidedly sotto voce. But its interest lies in the fact that it was an early instance of the effect col legno. Moreover, it was the genuine article. If little Haydn's performance lacked "body and tone," it was nevertheless drawn entirely "from the wood"; and history records that the tempo was irreproachable. His seat on these occasions was on the bench by the stove. These homely concerts ceased, as far as Master Joseph was concerned, upon his removal to Hainburg at the age of six. But he never forgot them, and when, nearly sixty years later, full of honour and renown, he came to visit once again the home of his childhood, he stood before this very spot and recounted to the friends who accompanied him the interesting scene so vividly impressed upon his memory.

THE MONUMENT TO HAYDN IN COUNT HARRACH'S PARK.
(From a photograph by Frank Merrick.)

Passing farther in, we reach the chamber which must have been the chief room in the house—the dwelling room, in fact. On the table lies the visitors' book, dating from 1841. Its long roll of signatures testifies to the greatness of the Master. The many nationalities speak of an unbounded sway. Happily, the fire made little conquest here. The massive beam which crosses the ceiling and the joists remain uninjured.

Leaving this room we find our way to the back of the house, perhaps the most interesting spot, since here is the modest apartment in which Haydn was born. But to-day it fills no higher office than a stable, and as we look in at the door, two sturdy cobs lazily look up from their well-filled bins.

Beethoven, when looking upon a picture of the Haydns' home, exclaimed: "To think that so great a man should have been born in a common peasant's cottage!" It was not, perhaps, one of the Bonn Master's happiest expressions. It savours more of the "land-owning" Johann than of the "brain-owning" Ludwig. Yet it is well nigh impossible to stand within this dingy apartment, now set to strangely different uses, without falling into a somewhat similar line of thought, and meditating upon the contrast between the lowly place in which the great composer's life was cradled and the exalted place in the Temple of Fame to which his genius entitled him.

A short distance from the wheelwright's humble abode is situated the chateau and estate of Rohrau's lord, Count Harrach, where, as already mentioned, Maria Haydn officiated as cook. That was of course in the days when she was Maria Koller. The reigning seigneur in the year 1795, being not a little proud of the honour brought to the locality by the son of the old servant of his house, erected a monument in his park to the composer. Haydn visited the spot at the Count's invitation, and was extremely gratified at this honour, one, moreover, especially unusual in those days. The monument has since been renovated. Near the top are extracts from Haydn's works. That facing us in the photograph is the noble Austrian hymn—a monument that will outlast that provided by the kindly thought of Graf Harrach. The bust at the top is said to be an excellent likeness of the Master.

But the time for our return to Vienna has come. Unwillingly we turn from the peaceful village with its associations so dear to musicians and bid good-bye to little Rohrau. Little, did we say? Yes, in size it is, and in all probability will continue so to remain. But viewed from another standpoint, we may surely affirm that many a city might envy the peculiar "greatness" of the little village which gave to the world the fertile brain and cheery heart of dear old Papa Haydn.

SOME RECOLLECTIONS.

X.—Critics I have known.

Contemporary with Davison in the early sixties flourished a group of musical critics for the most part of his own age, or thereabouts; all of whom, with one exception, have since departed to their rest. The doyen of the craft at the time under mention, and a man considerably older than those just referred to, was George Hogarth, father-in-law of Charles Dickens, and musical critic of the Daily News. I came upon the scene too late for anything approaching intimacy with Hogarth, but my recollection of him is clear. As he was born in 1783, and I am now speaking of, say, 1865, our "dean" had reached the time of life in which, if a man has lived cleanly, he is regarded as venerable. George Hogarth had a venerable appearance, at any rate. I recall an aged man, low in stature, feeble in gait, though helped by a stick; of round and ruddy countenance—his son-in-law might have spoken of him as "an apple-faced old gentleman"—and having a well-shaped head, crowned with a glory of white hair, which he, if I rightly remember, wore rather long. What measure of influence he wielded at an earlier age I do not know, but I have not preserved from the time of which I speak any distinct impression of power. Hogarth, however, was no mere literary dabbler in musical matters. He had studied the art in theory and practice. He was a contributor to the Harmonicon as far back as 1830, and became a recognised critic in 1834, when he took service on the staff of the Morning Chronicle, subsequently (1846) joining the just established Daily News, in the employ of which journal he remained till 1866, when he gave up his post to a colleague and assistant, Henry Lincoln. His published works include: "Musical History, Biography and Criticism" (1835), "Memoirs of the Musical Drama" (1838), and "The Philharmonic Society of London from its foundation, 1813, to its fiftieth year, 1862." It was a man of some mark, therefore, who moved feebly about the concert-rooms of thirty-five years ago—a survival from the last century; mere ashes, if you like, but ashes in which, as now and then appeared, "lived their wonted fires." Age prevented him, at the time of which I write, from going much into society; but I had a few opportunities of benefiting by his knowledge and experience. Only, however, for a brief period. George Hogarth, as already stated, laid down his critical pen in 1866. In 1870 he died.

While Hogarth was proceeding to take off his armour, a colleague, Charles Lewis Gruneisen, remained in the thick of the fray, and liked nothing better. How this gentleman came to be a musical critic I cannot imagine, and the initial difficulty in surveying his career as such seems to have overpowered the contributors to Grove's Dictionary, not one of whom has a word to say regarding him. In the supplement to Fétis he is, however, said to have been born in 1806; the son of a naturalised German (Dutchman), who had then resided in this country some ten years. Gruneisen figured largely among journals and journalists in his day; filled posts demanding varied qualities, and was as ready to act as special correspondent in a Carlist war as to report a Birmingham Festival. I have no doubt that he did both equally well. He was a man of war (with the pen) from his youth up, for proof of which refer to the volumes of the Musical World issued in the forties. By some means or other, it boots not now to ask what, Gruneisen had the misfortune to fall out with Davison. Should I say "misfortune"? Probably not, since there is abundant evidence to show that Gruneisen enjoyed the alarums and excursions incidental to a long spell of wordy warfare, and stuck to his heavy guns (they were very heavy) with grim determination. But he was no match for "J. W. D.," who out-fought him at all points. A far greater master of language; infinitely more cunning of fence, and a very Crœsus in wealth of resource, Davison could rout his opponent even on his opponent's own ground. The reader may be interested in a single example of these polemics. Gruneisen had been serving on the Morning Post (wherefore Davison dubbed him Jenkins), when George Hogarth left the Morning Chronicle for the Daily News. Always quick to see a vacancy, and prompt to secure it if possible, Gruneisen sought and gained the successorship to Hogarth. It then became his duty to sit in judgment upon Macfarren's opera, "Don Quixote"—to anyone acquainted with the two men this seems inconceivably ludicrous, but so it was. Davison "went for" Gruneisen's article and tore it into little bits. It may amuse the reader to be shown, as under, how this was done:—

G. The overture is in A three sharps.

D. Of the key A three sharps we never heard before. The writer cannot mean simply A, since that key having always three sharps, it is unnecessary to particularise its signature.

G. Alas, where is Rozinante? Where is Dapple?

D. Critic, thyself art Dapple, or a near kinsman.

G. The seguidilla is a solemn strain, with a most lugubrious refrain.

D. The seguidilla is no such thing—it is a cheerful air. The critic was thinking of a saraband.

G. A very pretty chorus, in E sharp, is Mr. Macfarren's seguidilla.

D. There is no such key known as E sharp.

G. The air, "Maid of Toboso," in G sharp, is a dreary infliction.

D. If the air were in G sharp it might prove a dreary infliction, but it happens to be in simple G.

G. The song of Allen, "Life is an April day," in A sharp, though it opens well, is insufficiently carried out.

D. The key of A sharp is another of the very sharp keys of this exceedingly sharp critic that are utterly unknown to musical composers. The key of Mr. Macfarren's song is D. The key of A sharp is never used—is totally unnecessary—and exists only in the muddled brain of the word-splutterer whose analysis we are analysing.

G. We will say little of Sancho's song in F flat.

D. The key of F flat is never used by composers.

Gruneisen's utterances are amazing, but it is still more astonishing to read: "The successor of Mr. Hogarth is not so shallow a person as you represent him. Though he may not know the difference between a drumstick and a chord of the seventh, he has managed to get engaged to three papers—the Britannia, the Illustrated London News, and the Morning Chronicle." Even more extraordinary is the fact that Gruneisen was for some years, at a later period, musical critic of the Athenæum.

Journalistic feuds seldom last for ever, and the seemingly virulent combatants of the forties were good friends in the sixties, when I came to know them. I have some doubt whether Gruneisen was entirely trusted, but nothing happened to disturb the harmony of the men's relations. At provincial festivals they "chummed together" invariably, and it was on such occasions—myself being admitted to the company as a third chum—that I had opportunity to study the active and bellicose critic with whom Davison did not disdain to cross swords. There were points in Gruneisen's nature which could not fail to attract. He was a staunch friend as well as a formidable foe. His devotion to Costa always appeared to me as extraordinary, seeing that the Italian conductor, austere, rigid, and proud, had none of the soft graces which sometimes call forth personal affection. But with Gruneisen, whatever Costa did was right. To question that chief's infallibility was to bring a hard glare into the eyes of his champion. When "St. Michael" spoke, no dog had the privilege of barking. Well, indiscriminating admiration is certainly a vice of the judgment, but it leans to virtue's side, and bespeaks qualities, both in its subject and its object, which we must respect. With all his bounce and bluster, Gruneisen certainly exercised noble and generous impulses. I have known him do many a kind act to persons who had no claim upon him, save that they were in need; and I have often seen him completely under the influence of the compassionate sentiment which ran, like a vein of gold, through the otherwise hard rock of his nature. But as a musical critic, and as regards the higher duties of a critical office, he remained pretty much what he seems to have been at the beginning. Let me, however, do him justice even in that capacity. He knew his deficiencies quite well, and strove most diligently to make up for them in other ways. A man of method, he accumulated a remarkable store of musical memoranda, so arranging the materials as that he knew where to put his hand at a moment's notice upon any required fact or opinion. Wherefore, whatever his articles lacked in musicianship or critical acumen, however much their English was slovenly and their matter ill-arranged, they were certainly informing as to points of history and so on. I own that I have been much indebted to them myself. Gruneisen worked his library for all it was worth. Small blame to him. But while doing good service through his books, Gruneisen's achievements purely as a critic were remarkable for ineptitude. Many were the stories of his ignorance, some true and others "well found." According to one of these, he asked a brother of the pen how it came to pass that though the horns always played in the key of C, they managed to accord with the rest of the orchestra, no matter what the tonality of the piece. Again, he is said to have expressed surprise that there were no trumpet parts in a certain score, and to have added, when a colleague pointed to the word trombe, "Oh, trombones of course." I personally remember that during the rehearsal of Mr. Goldschmidt's "Ruth" at Hereford in the long ago, Gruneisen protested that a choral fugue on a single subject was not a fugue at all. "Where is the second subject?" he demanded triumphantly. As to this critic's articles on new and important works produced at festivals, they were in some respects monumental. I particularly remember one (though I cannot recall the name of the work discussed) which, in its way, was a masterpiece—such a masterpiece that Davison, always ripe for a joke, began reading it aloud, after our dinner, in the presence of the author and myself. The incorrigible humorist picked out the plums one by one, saying to me, "Here is another remarkable passage," or "Here is a fine sentence," and so on. But this was sailing very near the wind. Davison, though he had wonderful command of feature, could not help showing signs of mirth, while, for my part, I suffered agonies in repressing a roar of laughter. Presently Gruneisen grew suspicious. His face set, and a hard light shone in his eyes. Thereupon I kicked Davison, under the table, and, like Dick Turpin, in the case of the Bishop's coachman, "purwailed on him to stop." It was a close shave; some time elapsing before Gruneisen recovered his usual after-dinner geniality. The marvel is that a writer so ill-equipped for difficult and delicate work on a subject largely technical became connected with important journals, which freely opened their columns to him, and seemed glad to secure his services. At one time he discussed musical doings in three or four papers, and, apparently, only Davison, in the years of their estrangement, expressed surprise. But everything was done by Gruneisen in the slap-dash style which is apt to impose upon outsiders. There were times when, after hearing a new work, he was not himself clear as to the line which should be taken in discussing it. I have mentioned Mr. Goldschmidt's "Ruth." On returning to our hotel after the performance of that oratorio, Gruneisen retired to his bed-room as though to work. He was only making up his mind. Presently he banged—there is no other word for the process—into our common sitting-room, exclaiming, "I shall go against it!" And he did, in most admirable technical disorder, and with unsurpassed "derangement of epitaphs."

As a critic, Gruneisen had limitations, and even faults. So have we all. But, as before said, he had merits also. A musician he could never be, but his library and note-books showed how earnestly, and with what painstaking labour, he tried to qualify himself as a historiographer of music. In that he became strong, and set a good example to younger men, few of whom, in an increasingly hurried and restless age, may have had time to benefit by it. I try to think of him, as a man, in the character of a most affectionate and devoted husband. Mrs. Gruneisen's birthday often fell on one of the days of a provincial festival, and it was her dutiful lord's pleasure on each occasion to spread a liberal feast and to propose the poor invalid lady's health, while his face lit up with the light of love. At such moments what mattered it that, as the story goes, he could not distinguish between trombe and tromboni? "A man's a man for a' that."

Sir Alexander Mackenzie has, we regret to learn, resigned the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society's concerts, which he has held during the past seven seasons. We understand on the highest authority that Sir Alexander's decision arises from his desire to devote more time to his old love—composition. More than one important work will probably be the early outcome of that leisure which the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music has long been seeking. In reviewing his seven years' tenure of office at the Philharmonic it is sufficient to refer to his conscientious and painstaking work at the conductor's desk, and also to the fact that he has consistently upheld the cause of English music. All native musicians are grateful to Sir Alexander Mackenzie for so carefully guarding their interests, and will cordially join in the wish that, as heretofore, he may experience much enjoyment and success in the creative sphere of the art he loves so well and serves so faithfully.

It was suggested by the out-going Professor of Music in Oxford (Sir John Stainer) that it would be beneficial to the University to make the Professorship tenable for ten years only. This was accepted by the Hebdomadal Council, and a Statute to carry this into effect was promulgated on the 6th ult. There are about 460 members of Congregation (that is, resident Masters of Arts), so it will interest our readers to know that exactly twenty-six of these thought the question of sufficient importance to claim their attendance and vote. How deeply Oxford must be interested in the welfare of the Faculty of Music! The art of logic has always been a much-cherished ingredient of Oxford education; the pros and cons, therefore, had been so carefully weighed by this small detachment that thirteen voted for the proposal and thirteen against: it was therefore lost. Opinions may be divided on the subject, but on the whole we are disposed to think the result unfortunate. It is most important that examinations should not get into a groove, and that the type of "exercise" should move with the perpetual progress of the art of music. But the best of Dons are liable to become crystallized in old age, and Oxford, had this proposal been carried, would probably have been able to find a brilliant succession of learned lecturers and experienced examiners to represent the art. The only consolation is that Sir Hubert Parry is as broad-minded as he is talented, so the Faculty will be in good hands for many years to come—very many, we hope.

At an Eisteddfod that took place recently in a small town in South Wales, the meetings were held in a huge tent pitched on a rough sloping field. Rain had fallen heavily for hours, and the ground within and without the tent was "muddy, ill-seeming, thick." In fact, it was nothing short of a gymnastic feat to get about at all. Night came, and still there were many competitors to be heard. When the tenor solo section was summoned, darkness had set in. No means had been provided for lighting the interior of the tent. The wind was howling and shaking the temporary canvas structure ominously. A candle was brought for the use of the wearied adjudicators, and by holding round it a sheet of music it was kept alight. The first competitor mounted a rough platform, a shielded candle was held behind him, and a similar illuminant was provided for the accompanist. One could see dimly in the tent a thousand or more white, upturned faces. Amid these weird and dispiriting surroundings the singer began "Deeper, and deeper still." By the time he had sung a few bars the whole audience became enthralled. The power of fine music and expressive singing to absorb the mind was surely never more clearly demonstrated. One forgot everything else and followed only the dramatic unfolding of Jephtha's agony. The performance appeared almost faultless. The singer's voice had the needed anguish and tears in the recitative, and in "Waft her, angels, to the skies," the gentleness and perfect ease and tune of the delivery charmed the ear. The enunciation, too, was so clear that every one of the audience could follow every word. It was not that the singer had such an exceptionally fine voice as that he had thoroughly permeated his singing with the requisite expression. So it is again and again in Wales. There is generally much scope for criticism in the management of a Welsh Eisteddfod. But the severest critics will admit that such gatherings stimulate and foster talent.

University men will be interested to hear that a club, to be called "The Oxford and Cambridge Musical Club," is being formed in London for the purpose of encouraging the practice and knowledge of chamber music, both vocal and instrumental, among its members. It is proposed to secure suitable premises in as central a position as possible. A considerable number of gentlemen have already become members; and the Club, which is under the presidency of Dr. Joachim, has the support of many of the best known musicians in London. Further information may be obtained from the provisional Secretaries, Mr. H. M. Abel (Oxon. Sec.), 10, King's Bench Walk, Temple, and Mr. W. B. Knobel (Camb. Sec.), 32, Tavistock Square.

Samuel Wesley was an adept in the almost lost art of letter writing. Amongst the friends with whom he corresponded in the early years of the century was Mr. Joseph Payne Street, who from 1795 to 1848 was librarian of the Madrigal Society. Ten letters from the composer of "In exitu Israel" to Mr. Street are now in the possession of the latter's grandson, Mr. J. Edward Street, who worthily upholds the madrigalian tradition of his family in the secretaryship of the vocal fraternity so devotedly served by his ancestor. Mr. Street has kindly allowed the following amusing letter from "old Sam" Wesley to be printed. Apart from its epistolary quaintness, the communication throws an interesting light upon the simple amusements as well as the frugal fare of our forefathers. Here is the letter, which, sent by "the twopenny post," is addressed: "To Mr. Street, No. 17 Mark Lane." The young gentleman therein referred to was then eleven years old. He subsequently became the Rev. Dr. Charles Wesley, sub-dean of the Chapel Royal, St. James's.

My dear Sir,

I have a little Scheme to propose, to which if you have any material Objection I will give it up without further Argument.

My Son Charles has lately been so diligent & assiduous in endeavouring to improve himself in such exercises as have appeared to me for his future Benefit, that I judge him very meritorious of what is called a Holiday or of any innocent Recreation for a few Hours on a leisure Day.—Now I think I can manage to command Wednesday, June 4, & as Charles has a great desire to hear the Tower Guns fired, he has asked me to permit him to go thither that Day, to which I have consented; & my subsequent Notion was, that if you were unengaged, we might contrive to pass the Remainder of the Day entre nous trois, & what I thought of proposing was to go down to Billingsgate, & dine upon some fresh Fish, if so be there should be any left by that Time: to stay there just as long or as short as we might find it pleasant & then stroll towards Chalk Farm, (which is the best Prospect I know among the Tea-Gardens), & finally, if we were not quite sick of one another's Company, repair to No. 9, Arlington Street, & take an unceremonious Crust of Bread & Cheese.

Here is the grand Plan of Operation, which if it meet your Suffrage, shall certainly be put into Execution.—If there were a Possibility of changing his Majesty's Birth Day from June 4 "at 22 minutes past 2 in the Morn," I should have been glad, because Wednesday is now one of the Days on which I have the most oppressive Work, but as I think I can engage my assistant to mount Guard for me throughout the whole of the Afternoon Business, I trust, that in Case of your Coincidence, I shall be able to make all smooth on the Occasion.

Your early Opinion & Decision upon this momentous Stratagem will oblige.

My dear Sir,
Yours ever truly,
[1806.] S. Wesley.

The Rev. Dr. Torrance is the subject of an interesting biographical article in the Dublin Daily Express of the 10th ult. A native of Rathmines, Dublin, Dr. Torrance emigrated to Australia thirty years ago, where, until last year, he laboured as a minister in the suburbs of Melbourne. He has been a prolific composer, his works including an opera, "William of Normandy," and three oratorios—"Abraham," "The Captivity," and "The Revelation of St. John." We believe that the last-named is shortly to be published.

The hobbies of musicians is a subject not without an interest peculiarly its own. It is true that a hobby may take an eccentric form, as in the case of the great double-bassist Dragonetti, who made an extraordinary collection of dolls! But in the majority of instances the non-professional pursuits of players upon instruments are less suggestive of wax and sawdust. In the organ world it is sufficient to mention the chess playing of Sir Walter Parratt and the attention that George Cooper gave to his ferns and to photography. Henry Smart, as a boy, showed a wonderful talent for mechanical drawing, and he took a delight in frequenting Messrs. Maudsley's great engineering workshops. A similar hobby, though more fully developed, is followed by a well-known organist of the present day, Mr. Walter Alcock, organist and choirmaster of Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Street, and assistant-organist of Westminster Abbey. With every desire to encourage the widening of the interests of musicians, we give a photograph of Mr. Alcock and his hobby. The following explanation thereof is in his own words and is furnished, as is also the photograph, at our request:—

(Photographed by Mr. Robert Johnson, 292, King's Road, Chelsea.)

Engines of all descriptions have always had a great fascination for me, and I managed, when a small boy, to construct several which worked satisfactorily, though I fear they would hardly have passed muster had they been submitted to an engineer. My father, who had given me the choice of becoming either an engineer or an organist, used to object very strongly to my hobby, observing that it was impossible to combine the two, and that I must give my undivided attention to music, as I had chosen that for my profession. However, behind the scenes, aided and abetted by my mother, great was the filing and laborious the drilling and cutting out of metal, to the detriment of the kitchen table and the absolute collapse of the maternal scissors.

One of the results of this enthusiasm was a tiny locomotive ("built" in 1877), whose boiler consisted of the humble cocoatina tin with the lid soldered on! Another was the crippling of a finger! And sad was the disappointment on this occasion, for I remember Sir John Stainer (always, as he is now, kind and encouraging) had promised that I should play an out-voluntary at St. Paul's. I shall never forget his amused face when I appeared to make my excuses, and explained the cause of the accident.

But these mechanical instincts were not entirely unconnected with music, for when organist of Twickenham Parish Church I made and fitted two extra composition pedals to the organ there, one of which (Great to Pedals "on" and "off") I believe still remains.

The accompanying photograph shows a model of a Midland engine, which I started in 1894 and completed in 1897, the work being done in my spare time. It is on a scale of one inch to a foot. Its fuel is ordinary coal, and with a steam pressure of 30 lb. per square inch it can pull a man weighing fourteen or fifteen stone along the track shown in the photograph. I could not get drawings to work from, but took the principal dimensions (with my walking-stick) from the big engines at St. Pancras.

Not only do I find my recreation a very enjoyable one, but I am strongly of opinion that all musicians should have some other interest besides their profession. It is constantly said of us that we are "so narrow," and though no one could love his work more than I do myself, or do greater homage to his instrument, yet I think that some "opposite" (it might be chess, reading, botany, &c.) is not only beneficial, but necessary as a balance to the one-sided strain which is imposed upon the mental and physical powers of a modern organist.

The Western Madrigal Society, in commemoration of the sixtieth year of its existence, held a festival dinner, on the 6th ult., at the Criterion Restaurant. Mr. Andrew K. Hichens, the president, was supported by the Right Hon. Herbert Gladstone, M.P.; the Hon. Spencer Lyttelton, C.B.; Mr. Alexander Henderson, M.P.; Mr. Howard Gilliat, and others. The visitors included Sir Frederick Bridge, the Rev. the Sub-Dean of the Chapels Royal (Rev. Edgar Sheppard), the Succentor of St. Paul's (Rev. Lewis Gilbertson), Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, and Mr. J. E. Street, in addition to many ladies. After dinner the following madrigals were sung, under the conductorship of Dr. Creser.

Madrigal,	"In the merry Spring"	Ravenscroft.
"	"Spring returns"	Marenzio.
"	"Thyrsis, sleepest thou"	Bennett.
"	"Stay, Corydon"	Wilbye.
"	"Under a willow"	Vecchi.
Pastoral,	"To June"	W. Creser.
Madrigal,	"Great God of Love"	Pearsall.
"	"All ye who music"	Donato.
"	"As Vesta was from Latmos"	Weelkes.
"	"Cynthia, thy song"	Croce.
"	"Fair Oriana"	Hilton.
"	"The silver swan"	O. Gibbons.
"	"My bonny lass"	Morley.
Finale,	"The waits"	Saville.

The Royal Academy of Music announces that two open scholarships will be competed for in September next. The first is the Henry Smart Scholarship (founded by subscription, 1880, in memory of Henry Smart), which at this election is for female candidates, who must be British-born subjects under twenty years of age. The subjects of examination will be organ playing and composition, and candidates may enter in either or both subjects. The scholarship is tenable for three years; the funds (which amount to about £17 10s. per annum) being appropriated towards the cost of the scholar's instruction in the Academy for that period. The other exhibition is the John Thomas Welsh Scholarship (founded by subscription, 1883, collected mainly in the Principality by Mr. John Thomas (Pencerdd Gwalia), harpist to the Queen). The forthcoming competition will be for instrumentalists of both sexes, who must be under eighteen years of age. Candidates must not be, nor ever have been pupils of any Metropolitan Institution for musical instruction, and either they or their parents must have been born in Wales. The successful candidate is entitled to three years' free instruction in the Royal Academy of Music. Candidates will be required to play a piece of their own selection and to read a piece at first sight. Further particulars may be obtained from the Secretary of the Royal Academy of Music.

The action of the London County Council on the subject of the foundation of "National Opera" has called forth a very influentially signed letter on the subject of raising the funds for the erection of a suitable Opera House. After quoting the recent resolutions of the Council (to which we referred in our last issue) the letter proceeds thus:—

> If the generous offer of the London County Council is supplemented by the same public spirit which has been so frequently shown in connection with other departments of art, the foundation of a national Opera will thus become an accomplished fact; the greatest examples of dramatic music will be brought within the reach of the whole community, the system of musical education which has been so largely assisted by private subscriptions in this country will be provided with its natural and necessary outlet, and Great Britain will cease to be the only country in Europe in which such an institution is not a part of the national life.
> So excellent an opportunity has never been given to our national music by a representative public body as is now offered by the generosity of the London County Council, and we feel convinced that the public will not allow it to be lost.
> The sum estimated for the erection of a suitable Opera House is £100,000. There will in addition be required a sum as endowment, to guarantee the Opera against loss for a term of years. This sum is estimated at an annual average amount of £10,000, and should be secured for a minimum of at least eight years.
> The expert witnesses called by the committee of the London County Council were of opinion that the annual subvention required would tend to decrease if it did not altogether disappear, and this expression of opinion seems to warrant us in naming eight years as the term for such a subsidy, taking into consideration the large population to which the undertaking will appeal.
> This period will also be sufficient to test the interest of the general public in the question and to ensure that discussion and appreciation on their part which would warrant the Council in giving practical encouragement to this higher form of musical art. The scheme is to give during the Autumn and Winter the best operas, both past and present, in the language of this country and interpreted, as far as possible, by English speaking artists.

An orchestral society in Vienna, which takes its name from Haydn, has collected sufficient funds to lease the little house, in order to turn it into a small Haydn museum, Here the composer of the "Creation" lived the last few years of his life and died. It is situated at No. 19, in what was once the Kleine Steingasse and is now the Haydngasse. The Museum was formally opened on May 31, the ninetieth anniversary of the composer's death, and is now free to the public at all times. Amongst the interesting objects shown in the museum are the autograph manuscript scores of the "Creation," the "Seasons," eight pianoforte sonatas, three symphonies, the last quartet, and the Austrian National (or "Emperor's") Hymn, "Gott erhalte Franz den Kaiser," which, in January, 1797, he composed in the identical room where the autograph now reposes. About twenty portraits of Haydn at different periods of his life are also exhibited, in addition to several other pictures connected with the various events in his career. There are fifty-seven coins and medals and other personal relics of the genial old "Papa."

The Children and Gentlemen of the Chapels Royal, under the able direction of Dr. Creser, the organist, sang an excellent selection of unaccompanied part-music at a garden party given by H.R.H. the Duchess of Albany, in Clarence House Gardens, St. James's, on the 20th ult., in aid of the "Deptford Fund." A specially interesting if not unique feature of the programme was that all its twelve pieces were the compositions of past and present Children and Gentlemen of the Chapels Royal. Here is the programme:—

Ballet,	"My bonny lass she smileth"	Morley.
Madrigal,	"Brightly dawns our wedding day" ..	Sullivan.
Part-Song,	"Links of Eden"	Bevan.
Ballet,	"Now is the month of Maying"	Morley.
Chorus,	"In these delightful pleasant groves" ..	Purcell.
Part-Song,	"Oh, hush thee, my babie"	Sullivan.
Ballet,	"Dainty, fine, sweet nymph"	Morley.
Madrigal,	"The silver swan"	Gibbons.
Part-Song,	"The bells of St. Michael's Tower" ..	Knyvett.
Madrigal,	"When love and beauty"	Sullivan.
Pastoral,	"To June"	Creser.
Madrigal,	"Fire, fire"	Morley.

Axminster has hitherto been noted for its carpets. It can now boast of an organist who has held his appointment for upwards of fifty years. Mr. Thomas N. Webber, organist of the Parish Church, is the veteran in question. As a matter of fact, he was appointed to the post he still holds as long ago as the year 1835, after his choristership at Exeter Cathedral and assistant-organistship to S. S. Wesley's predecessor! For ten years (1840-50), however, he was organist at Ottery St. Mary; but he returned to his old love at Axminster at the half-century, and there he has been ever since. In a private letter he says:

> I am thankful to be able to say, that enjoying a wonderful measure of health, I am still able to conduct full choral services and teach my choir without fatigue or undue weariness; all this I say without boastfulness, but humbly ascribing my manifold blessings to a merciful and protecting Providence.

Congratulations to Mr. Webber upon such a long record of faithful, honourable service; and may the eventide of his life be attended with "heaven's best treasures, peace and health."

Sir Charles Hubert Hastings Parry, M.A., D.Mus. Choragus, Hon. Fellow of Exeter College, and Director of the Royal College of Music, received at Oxford, on the 21st ult., the honorary degree of D.C.L., on the occasion of the Encœnia, or Commemoration of Founders and Benefactors to the University.

Mr. George Riseley and M. Jules Rivière will conduct the Covent Garden Promenade Concerts to be given under the auspices of Mr. Cecil Barth. Mr. Riseley will direct the first part of each programme and M. Rivière the second part.

Mr. Edgar F. Jacques, by virtue of his lectures "On the Music of India and the East," at the Royal Institution, has awakened the amusing muse of an anonymous bard, who has burst into poetry thuswise:—

There is a sage critic named Jacques,
Who in learning the largest cake tacques,
For he simply knows loads
Of weird things in the Modes,
And tunes of the most Eastern macques.

He lectured in Albemarle Street,
And his words were both wise and discreet;
But he chiefly preferred
The quarter-tone third (!)
Which in Siam and Java we meet.

Mr. Alfred Gibson has been presented by his numerous pupils, past and present, at the Royal Academy of Music, the Guildhall School of Music, and those studying under him privately, with a pianoforte, in commemoration of his jubilee. The presentation took place on the 26th ult., at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms, amid many expressions of congratulation and respect for this truly admirable artist and much esteemed teacher of the violin.

Mr. Thomas Adams, for the past eleven years organist and choirmaster of St. Alban's, Holborn, has recently been presented by the clergy, churchwardens, sidesmen, and a few friends with a "Beeston-Humber" bicycle as "a slight appreciation of his valuable services." Not only is this very gratifying to the worthy recipient, but the appropriateness of the form of the gift is obvious: an organist is nothing if he is not skilled in the art of pedalling.

Mr. Herman Merivale recalls a very charming saying of Rossini's to Carlotta Grisi, whose death was recently recorded. The famous dancer complained to the composer of "Il Barbiere" that Giulia Grisi's success as a singer obliged her (Carlotta) to fall back upon the dancer's profession. "What would you more, my child?" he said. "Giulia has stolen the nightingale's voice, but she has left you its wings."

Mr. F. H. Cowen is going to Canada as the examiner of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. Mr. Cowen has made it a condition of his appointment that his services should be gratuitous. Mr. Myles B. Foster is about to proceed to Australia to examine for Trinity College, London.

"Y mae Syr John Stainer yn ymddiswyddo o fod yn Broffeswr Cerddoriaeth yn Rhydychen; efe a lanwodd y gadair er pan fu farw Syr F. Gore Ouseley." Thus says our excellent contemporary Y Cerddor, and the statement is, unfortunately, quite consonant with the truth.

Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan, organist of Bangor Cathedral, has been appointed by the Prince of Wales to the office of "Grand Organist of England in the Mark Degree of Freemasonry." We are given to understand that this is the first time the honour has gone to the Principality.

JOSEPH JOACHIM
AT THE PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.
1844—1899.

A feature of unusual interest manifested itself at the concert of the Philharmonic Society on June 1st. Fifty-five years ago, almost to the very day, "the celebrated Hungarian Boy" (to adopt Mr. Alfred Bunn's designation), Joseph Joachim, played at a Philharmonic concert, given at the Hanover Square Rooms. The actual date was May 27, 1844, when Master Joachim, then aged thirteen, gave a masterly performance of Beethoven's Violin Concerto. And now, although more than half-a-century has passed, he has played the same masterpiece under the auspices of the same Society. On the opposite page we give a full-sized reproduction of the actual programme of the said concert in 1844. The original was formerly in the possession of the late Mr. William Bartholomew, who in all probability used it at the concert. Its present owner and the writer of these lines took the programme to the concert (at Queen's Hall) on the 1st ult., and in the interval he asked Dr. Joachim to enrich it with his autograph signature. The great violinist was much interested in the proposal, and, in readily complying with the request, he laughingly said he would add "the little fellow," the reference being to a criticism which was passed on his boyish performance in 1844. Such an endorsement of an old programme so long after the event to which it referred, and under such circumstances, is probably unique; and thus we have special pleasure in giving our readers the benefit of it in the form of the accompanying fac-simile.

Mr. W. H. Cummings, Treasurer of the Philharmonic Society, in a speech on the evening of the 1st ult., quoted from a criticism on the concert of May 27, 1844, written by one of the foremost critics of the day, which included the singular statement that "The violin concerto of Beethoven is a great, though a singular composition." In reference to Joachim, the critic said: "A musician at heart, as well as a fiddler at finger, this extraordinary little fellow reads classical music of the highest order with the depth and judgment of the oldest head."

The programme derives further interest from the fact that Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" was performed for the first time in England on that occasion, and that the composer conducted the entire concert. Staudigl sang and the name of J. L. Hatton appeared in the programme. "Pascal Bruno" is now forgotten; but Staudigl, who was much struck with its music, produced the opera at Vienna on March 2, 1844, and it was doubtless due to him that the duet, "Stung by horror," was sung.

The date of the concert almost coincides with the birth of a certain musical journal, which has just entered upon the fifty-sixth year of its existence—we refer to The Musical Times. On June 1, 1844, this periodical made its entry into the world. It was then a wee infant, modestly clad in the swaddling clothes of a sheet of eight pages, three of which were devoted to the music of Purcell's "In these delightful, pleasant groves."

One paragraph in this our "No. 1" is headed "Encores." It referred to a concert given by the York Choral Society, the second part of which was only partly given, by reason of the following circumstance:—

> The second song was "Sweet Bird," which elicited such immense applause, that the performers could not proceed with the next piece; and, it being a standing rule with the committee to allow no encores, the concert broke up!

Oh! that the Philharmonic and every other Society would adopt this rule—and stick to it!

SIR JOHN STAINER ON "THE INFLUENCE OF FASHION ON THE ART OF MUSIC."

Sir John Stainer delivered his last lecture as Professor of Music in the University of Oxford on May 5, when he took as his theme "The influence of fashion on the art of music." After referring to the domination of mere fashion in common and the copying propensities of its votaries, Sir John said:—

"In matters of musical art we must distinguish carefully between those composers who deliberately adopt a certain style after having mastered its underlying principles, and those who simply copy its most easily recognised accessories in the way of ornament or detail. The former are legitimate representatives of a School of Art, the latter are mere propagators of a Fashion. The former have grasped the essence of the style they have adopted, the latter have only caught its accidental features. In fact, the fashionable imitator often turns out a sort of piebald work in which the mannerism or ornaments characteristic of a particular style are introduced and joined to something with which they are totally incompatible. Many of you must have observed this fact while listening to those modern imitations of old English songs which were so fashionable recently. In nearly every case, however cleverly the old peculiarities and tricks have been copied, you will suddenly hear a few bars which could not possibly have been contemporaneous with the rest.

COMPOSER-IMITATORS.

"Handel was surrounded during his life and followed after his death by a host of weak imitators. Their music was but a short-lived fashion, because, in due course, people discovered that Handel's mannerisms, unsupported by his massive genius, rapidly palled on the taste. Handel's mighty contemporary, Bach, offers great temptation to imitators, he has unmistakable mannerisms, and his methods are broad and clear. Two facts, however, make any attempt to produce sham Bach always futile. His technical skill in harmony, counterpoint, and methods of composition generally, are absolutely unapproachable, and he wrote so much as to practically exhaust the resources of his own style. Though Mozart and Haydn kept such a hold on the public for many years, their influence was certainly beneficial, and one cannot say that their style created a weak fashion. The compositions of the best imitator of Mozart's pianoforte style—namely, Hummel—still holds a fairly good position in art. It has often been asked, 'How is it that Beethoven cannot be said to have founded a school of composition?' The fact is remarkable, especially as he possessed striking mannerisms*; but if you go behind his mannerisms you will find a depth of thought which defies all attempts at counterfeit.

"Some of you here present may be old enough to have lived in the very thick of the Mendelssohn and Spohr mania. When once the beautifully-turned and refined diction of Mendelssohn had become appreciated, all fashionable composers imitated him as far as they possibly could without becoming actual plagiarists. I think one might well make Mendelssohn say 'Save me from my friends,' for I feel quite sure that the true cause of much of the modern tendency to depreciate Mendelssohn's position in art has been the sense of plethora and surfeit brought about by the perpetual hearing of weak imitations of his characteristics. He has been a sufferer simply because his style became fashionable. But, shun his imitators, and go to the pure fount of his greatest vocal and instrumental compositions, and I will answer for your profound acknowledgment of his greatness.

"The style of Schumann is not easily imitated—any attempt to use his works as a model generally ends in the production of a caricature; and his imagination was so fertile that he formed a style without actual mannerisms though intensely individual. The fashionable cult of Wagner and of Brahms is now beginning to leave an important stamp on the works of young composers and on the art of music generally, notwithstanding the fact that, critically speaking, the aims and ideals of these two men were absolutely divergent: the one throwing down old barriers with an exclamation of contempt, and rushing into new spheres of thought with an almost wild delight, using fresh methods of expression with a lavishness which hardly allows the hearer time to follow him or trace his steps; the other deeply imbued with the beauty of classical forms, and finding himself able by his genius to impart new life and fresh vigour into the very framework and mechanism which a too hasty criticism had begun to disparage as worn out and useless, failing, dying.

"But if we may congratulate ourselves on the fact that the works of Wagner and Brahms are not only loved by the trained musician, but a source of interest and pleasure to educated society at large, it is perhaps too early to venture an opinion as to the value of their influence on the many rising young English composers whose watchword is 'Forward,' or the less conscientious class who want to profit by the fact that Wagner and Brahms are unmistakably in fashion.

"If Brahms had left behind him as a legacy to humanity nothing but his vast contribution to the literature of songs, it would be impossible to keep him out of the first rank of modern composers. I need not here enlarge upon their continuous flow of rich melody raised above ever freshly manipulated harmony, the extraordinary variety of their style, their direct appeal to the heart of the hearer, the solid basis of intellect on which they are built, and the cleverness of their construction. In short, they are the work of a master hand directed by lofty genius. His influence in this direction has been strong on contemporary writers, and he has helped undoubtedly by his example to call into existence those many collections of songs by writers of all European nationalities which we hope are destined ere long to destroy, as utterly as it deserves to be destroyed, that dreadful monstrosity of creation, the fashionable English drawing-room ballad.

SONGS IN TRAINING COLLEGES.

"I have a special reason for giving attention to songs. I have been Inspector of Music in Training Colleges for the last sixteen years. The students in these colleges receive, as most of you are aware, two years' admirable training as a preparation for their career as teachers in elementary schools of all kinds—Church schools, Board schools, Wesleyan, Roman Catholic, or any other denomination which starts a training college. The musical examination of these students consists in testing the correctness of their ears, making them read music at sight, also each student has to sing a song, and then all combine for choral music. Dr. McNaught (my assistant-inspector) and I divide the work between us, but I have calculated that during the last sixteen years I have had to listen to at least 1,000 songs a year—i.e., 16,000 in all. When I first took up the work of Dr. Hullah (my predecessor), I found that very little restriction had been placed on the selection of songs, and I had to hear such specimens as 'The Grave-digger,' 'The Diver,' 'The jolly old oak,' 'The Sexton,' 'The Bugler,' 'The Three Postboys,' 'Annie Laurie,' &c. One student asked me if he might sing me a comic song! I had to draw the line there. But by dint of constant grumbling, and, better still, owing to the cordial co-operation of the college teachers, such beautiful songs are now selected and they are often so charmingly sung that it is quite a pleasure to listen to them. Just hear how matters have improved: in 1897 I reported to the Department that I and Dr. McNaught had during the year had the pleasure of listening to songs by Mendelssohn, 580 times; Schubert, 235; Handel, 201; S. Bennett, 166; Schumann, 82; Beethoven, 35; Spohr, 28. These were taken merely as a sample, but this selection accounts for nearly 1,350 of the songs we heard; the majority of the remainder being by no means unworthy of study. As schoolmasters and schoolmistresses trained in these colleges are quickly snapped up for posts in the best elementary schools in the country, the character of their influence on music amongst the lower, and lower middle classes, is of the highest importance. The mass of the population must eventually be reached through the medium of the four or five million children who go to our elementary schools. And we are already finding that the upper standards in schools are being taught easy specimens of songs by the great composers; the elder children soon prefer them to the rubbish which a mistaken fashion considers specially suitable to children, and the seeds of good taste are being thus sown. Of course much of this laboriously sown seed may be, in the after life of the children, destroyed by the music hall songs so fashionable among the frequenters of those places of (so-called) entertainment, but that some of the good seed will take root we hope and believe.

ACCOMPANIMENTS TO SONGS.

"There is only one drawback to the beautiful German and French songs which are destined, I think, eventually to eject our weak but fashionable drawing-room ballads, and that drawback is really a serious one. I allude to the difficulty of the pianoforte accompaniments. In the majority of those of an advanced type, the singer cannot possibly accompany himself or herself owing to the rapid or complicated movements of the hands; sometimes the hands are constantly crossing each other, in many cases the accompaniments can only be mastered by a really good pianist. The result is that the man or woman who selects the finest modern songs and has taken great pains to render them well is always liable to have the singing and the composer's music hopelessly ruined by an inefficient accompanist. Some of the most difficult of these modern songs have been sarcastically described as duets for voice and pianoforte! As the highest type of German and French songs is already showing its influence on the songs of our advancing young English composers, and is happily likely to become fashionable, I fear that the difficult accompaniment will also become fashionable; signs that this will be the case are already visible. I confess I cannot see why composers should risk the proper treatment of, and general use of their songs by the character of their accompaniment; and now that our grand pianofortes are of such giant stature and strength there is the additional danger that the voice part may be completely overpowered by a too zealous pianist. But, notwithstanding all this, the new style of song coming into fashion is an enormous stride from the outgoing type. But in the important matter of style, is England always to follow and never to lead? It would seem so at present, but we must wait and hope.

THE PART-SONG.

"The song for one voice naturally suggests a few words about the song in parts—or, as we call it, the part-song. Fifty or sixty years ago the glee, a pure English school of composition, was a great favourite in the home. Musical families, or the musical members of two or three families, used to sing glees regularly in the evenings for their own pleasure and that of a few friends, and there were many glee clubs. As you all know, we possess a very large literature of this class of composition, a large proportion of which is of a distinctly high order of merit. Perhaps I ought to point out that the glee differs from a part-song not only in the fact that there should be only one voice to a part, but also because all the parts must be flowing and melodious and each must have an importance of its own. Hence, in the more elaborate glees there is a considerable amount of imitative and contrapuntal writing, beautiful and interesting, but of course requiring good musicianship in all the voices. As the glee of the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries was the legitimate successor of the madrigal, so also the fashion of singing glees at home naturally followed after that fashion of singing madrigals at home which is mentioned by so many seventeenth century writers. The part-song, as its name implies, so far from having independent part-writing and contrapuntal devices, is nothing more or less than a harmonised melody, the harmonisation never being elaborate or complicated; it should not be so. Part-songs, as you all know, are of German origin. They arose from the fact that musical people, and especially students, found some harmonies an agreeable addition to the hundreds of simple folk-songs so well known to all and so loved by all. For a long time the harmonies remained unwritten, and as a natural consequence they were subject to any eccentric variations which individuals might try experimentally. We all know the extraordinary chords which we hear when a large body of people try to harmonise 'God save the Queen' or the 'Old Hundredth' without premeditation.

"The harmonised German folk-song soon found its way into England, and with it a large number of compositions in the same style by the best German composers of that time, amongst them Mendelssohn, to whom we probably owe the real popularising of the part-song in this country. Being much easier of performance and allowing a large number to 'join in,' and also one might say 'prop each other up' when any little difficulty had to be surmounted, the part-song took a powerful and permanent hold; the fashion of home glee singing died out, and this beautiful form of composition is only now kept alive by the survival of a few of the old glee clubs in London and by the choirs of our provincial cathedrals; just as the taste for madrigals is being kept alive by a few old established madrigal societies, and some enthusiasts, such as Mr. Lionel Benson.

"There was, however, one particular reason for the pushing out of the old glee by the new intruder, the part-song, which is of some interest. It is this. Concurrently with the introduction of part-songs, there were beginning to spring up all over England church choirs; the clarinet, bassoon, and violoncello were ousted, and with them the West-end vocal quartet, which, under the pretext of leading the congregation, which it sometimes did, also showed itself off, which it always did. It is of universal experience that if you want to keep a choir together, especially where easy and congregational church music is used, you must make them study some other class of music and widen their interest in the art. The part-song was the very thing wanted for this purpose: easy, sprightly, and effective; a few, of various styles, could be thoroughly mastered by a series of weekly practices in the parish schoolroom or elsewhere. If you look at the early numbers of THE MUSICAL TIMES AND SINGING CLASS CIRCULAR (which is its full title), issued by Alfred Novello, you will find side by side with cheap and easy church music, such as chants, settings of the Te Deum, and simple anthems, a regular series of part-songs.

"For a considerable number of years—in fact, until quite recently, part-songs were the chief constituents of the programmes of parish concerts, the long list being occasionally interspersed with a few songs and an instrumental solo, when one could be got. The part-song is not quite so much in fashion as it used to be; church choirs, and those numerous choral societies which have grown out of them, having become sufficiently ambitious to attack cantatas, oratorios, and other larger works. While it lasted, the fashion had the good result of bringing into existence many beautiful compositions by Smart, Macfarren, Leslie, Barnby, Sullivan, and a score of others.

HYMN TUNES.

"As regards fashion in hymn tunes, I have so often spoken of it in previous lectures that I need say but little to-day. England, in the latter half of last century and the early part of this, was flooded with tunes of the most commonplace and weak type. Some of the tunes to which the noblest examples of last century hymns were originally sung are perfectly execrable—such as 'Jesu, Lover of my soul,' and 'When I survey the wondrous Cross,' sung to the tune 'Tombstone.' Within the last forty years an entirely new school of hymn tunes has come into existence, the best exponents of which were S. S. Wesley, W. H. Monk, Dr. J. B. Dykes, and, later still, Barnby, Elliott, and Sullivan. If some of the modern tunes are too 'tuney,' taken as a whole, it must at least be admitted that they are congruous with and illustrative of the words to which they are attached; and the blame which is often heaped on the composer of what are called weak and sentimental tunes must at least be shared by the author who produced the weak, sentimental words. But many of the beautiful warm-hearted stanzas from the pens of our best modern authors actually need to be wedded to a sympathetic tune.

"I recall a curious illustration of this. In the original issue of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern' (1861), Mrs. Alexander's lovely hymn, 'The roseate hues of early dawn,' was wedded to the tune known as the Old 44th, a really fine tune in itself. But, though both words and music were admirable, taken separately, the combination of a sixteenth century tune with an essentially nineteenth century lyric was most incongruous; it was more than incongruous, it was almost funny, and of course a modern tune was attached to the hymn at the next revision (1875).

THE SPEED OF HYMN TUNES.

"After many years of protest from musicians and amateurs whose words deserve respect, a vicious fashion is beginning to die out, though I fear but slowly. I refer to the fashion of singing hymns at an absurdly rapid pace. We must not, however, be too hard on those who started this fashion; it was, after all, but a natural re-action from the tedious drawl of Tate and Brady's New Version, which was to be heard in most of our churches when I was a child. The slowness of old-fashioned Psalm singing can hardly be realised in these days, but it is still maintained in some parts of Germany and in Holland. I took the metronomic mark by my watch of a Psalm tune I heard in a church in Rotterdam, and it was 𝅗𝅥 = 24—that is to say, every note was held on for rather more than two seconds. It was a Psalm in eight-line stanzas, and I assure you I felt quite unable to trace the melody, and by the time the last line was finished I had not the smallest conception what the first line of the tune was like.

"It will give you some idea of the contrast between this and the present so-called 'hearty' singing, if I tell you that I have often heard Barnby's beautiful tune to 'When morning gilds the skies' sung exactly six times as fast—namely, 𝅗𝅥 = 144. The remedy for these two opposite absurdities is simple enough. It only requires a little sense of historical propriety on the part of clergy and musicians. Tunes composed in the sixteenth and early part of the seventeenth centuries, whatever their nationality—German, French, or English—should be sung rather slowly; this would include German chorales, such as 'Nun danket alle Gott' and 'Ein' feste Burg,' and others; also Franco-Genevan tunes, such as the 'Old Hundredth' and 'Commandments,' and early English Psalm tunes found in such collections as Daye, Este, and Ravenscroft. The middle English tunes, such as 'St. Anne,' 'Rockingham,' 'Hanover,' and others should be sung a little faster, but still only at a moderate pace. Quite modern tunes must of course follow the character of the words and the definite wishes of the composer; such tunes as Langran's 'Hark, the sound of holy voices,' Smart's 'Pilgrims of the night,' or Dykes's 'Ten thousand times ten thousand' should be sung at a brisk pace. Hymns of a penitential character and also those used during Holy Communion should of course be rendered solemnly and slowly. Many of you will justly say that 'musical instinct' should easily discover the proper tempo; true, but the instinct of true and just tempi is, strangely enough, a very rare gift. I have known many musicians of considerable power and taste to break down completely in the test of performing compositions at their proper pace.

FASHION IN ORGAN ARRANGEMENTS.

"The development of the organ during the last fifty years in two directions—namely, the multiplying of stops imitating orchestral instruments, and the facility of execution rendered possible by pneumatic levers attached to the keys—has led to some unfortunate results. These two developments, orchestral registers and a touch as light as a pianoforte, have in combination led organists to cast aside much valuable legitimate organ music, and attempt the reproduction of purely orchestral works. I have myself heard the Overtures to 'William Tell,' 'Masaniello,' and 'Midsummer Night's Dream' (amongst others) reproduced on the organ. Just imagine how the delicate staccato violin passages of 'William Tell' and of 'Midsummer Night's Dream' are ruined by transference to the King of Instruments. Again, the fact that rapid music can be played on an organ makes organists forget that, in a church or cathedral where there is considerable reverberation, quick passages, especially if forte, become merely a chaotic muddle. And young organists are so anxious to get control over an instrument with plenty of solo stops, and all the latest improvements, that organs in churches are often far too large. Only a performer of the best taste and long experience can be trusted with an unduly large organ; in the hands of a youngster it is nothing more or less than a dangerous explosive!

THE FASHION OF DIFFICULTY.

"Fashion has a curious and very insidious effect on our musical judgment and critical powers. We must all have observed the taste for complicated and difficult music which the modern advanced style has made general. In listening to orchestral works, or the orchestral accompaniment of vocal works which our young composers furnish for provincial musical festivals, I have been forced to come to the conclusion that difficult music is at the present time fashionable; indeed, I very much doubt if any composer of the present generation would dare to produce something exceedingly simple. It is more than probable that it would be treated with actual contempt by many of our professional critics. It seems to be forgotten that the practical difficulties in Beethoven's later works, and in Wagner, are necessary for the production of definite results and effects which could not otherwise be obtained; this is a totally different thing to the creating of difficulties in order to make music sound modern or abstruse. Englishmen ought specially to beware of this temptation to write 'difficulties for difficulty's sake,' as it is undeniable that one of the gifts, or, some would say, the only gift we Englishmen can now claim and have always been able to claim is that of being able to compose beautiful simple melodies. I might begin with Dowland, Lawes, Blow, and Purcell, and trace an unbroken pedigree passing through the period of Arne, Dibdin, and onward to Sir Henry Bishop, Henry Smart, Sterndale Bennett, and winding up with Dykes and Arthur Sullivan. When an Englishman therefore tries to imitate the chromatic and complicated style of the modern advanced German school, he is deliberately going out of a style in which we have always excelled into a style in which, as a matter of fact, we have always failed. This love of practical difficulty for its own sake has a pernicious effect on our young instrumentalists. In nine cases out of ten if you ask a student of the violin or pianoforte to play to you, he or she will select, not the most beautiful, but the most difficult piece recently learnt. Youngsters are always more anxious to show off their agility than their power of expression; when more experienced they learn sometimes, though not always, that there is something higher and better than racing up and down and about the gamut at tip-top speed.

SINGERS AND THE VIBRATO.

"Singers are not so tempted to become musical racehorses as instrumentalists. The most unpleasant fashion, in which too many singers acquiesce, is that of the abuse of vibrato. When words and music, or a dramatic situation, have worked a singer up to a high pitch of excitement, it is most natural that the voice should throb with passionate emotion; and because it is natural, under such circumstances listeners are deeply affected by it. But when this vibrato commences on the first note of a song and asserts itself throughout, notwithstanding the varying character of the words, its force is utterly wasted, and, so far from carrying hearers with it, most hearers would prefer to be carried away from it.

ART SUPREME, NOT FASHION.

"But whether fashion be good or bad, whether it may exercise at one time a beneficial and at another a baneful influence, we must remember that art ever presses onward, struggling to improve its methods of expression, and to raise to an ideal level the thoughts it desires to express; entreating the throng which without it would pass along life's road, intent on nothing but commercial gain or physical pleasure, to come and listen to its deep teaching. Fashion is only the fringe of the robe of art, the hem of the garment of that mighty power which moves among the struggling mass of mankind, teaching them to value and cultivate those higher qualities and tastes which call forth into life and light a hidden store of tenderness, sympathy, and brotherhood. The gentle and refining influence of art can, indeed, make a man something even better than a reasonable or clever being—namely, a loveable being. The truly wise will see the real existence, the entity of art, through the thin gauze of varying manifestations, and if her lessons, and her entreaties sink into the soul, the enthusiast and the devotee will find that she has the power to transform unpolished nature, just as marvellously as the rough dull stone is converted by the hand of the lapidary into a sparkling gem. And of all the branches of art, not one is more capable of realising this lofty aim than that which hovers round the cradle, is the handmaid of worship, the pleasure of the home, and hymns its farewell over our grave—Music."

AN OLD BOOK ON DANCING.

Dancing is not a subject usually associated at the present day with the study of French grammar or pronunciation; it was, however, in a French grammar that printed instructions in the art of dancing first appeared in England.

"The Introductory to wryte and to pronounce frenche compyled by Alexander Barcley compendiously at the commaundment of the ryght hye excellent and myghty prynce Thomas duke of Northfolke," is the title of the book in question, a thin black-letter quarto printed, as the colophon tells us, "at London in the Fletestrete at the sygne of the rose Garlande by Robert coplande the yere of our lorde MCCCCCXXI the XXII day of Marche."

This little book, owing doubtless to its former popularity, is now of the utmost rarity, and the copy in the Bodleian Library at Oxford, which formerly belonged to William Herbert, the editor of Ames's Typographical Antiquities, and afterwards to Francis Douce the antiquary, is probably unique.

The grammar proper covers rather more than thirty out of thirty-two pages, and we then come to a fresh title introducing what was probably regarded by the French student of 1521 as the most interesting part of the book.

"Here foloweth the maner of dauncynge of bace daunces after the use of fraunce and other places translated out of frenche in englysshe by Robert coplande."

The translator evidently felt that some apology was needed for the intrusion of this matter into his sober treatise, for, after giving directions for the performance of the dance and figures illustrating the variations of which it is capable, he adds a note: "These daunces haue I set at the ende of this boke to thentent that euery lerner of the sayd boke after theyr dylygent study may rejoyce somwhat theyr spyrytes honestly in eschewynge of ydlenesse the portresse of vyces."

The "basse danse," as it was termed in French, was so named by way of contrast to the "danse par haut" or "danse sautée," of which the Galliard and Tourdion, and later the Sauterelle and Volte were examples. It was of a sedate and courtly character and closely resembled the Pavan, which was already supplanting it in popular favour; when "Thoinot Arbeau" published his "Orchésographie" in 1588 it had long fallen into disuse, though not beyond hope of revival. "Les basse-dances," he writes, "sont hors d'usage depuis quarante ou cinquante ans: mais je prevoy que les matrones sages et modestes les remettront en usage, comme estant une sorte de dance pleine d'honneur et modestie," and he proceeds to give detailed directions for their performance, which agree in the main with the rules given by Copland in 1521 when the dance was still in vogue. Copland begins:—

> For to daunce ony bace daunce, there behoueth IIII paces, that is to wite, syngle, double, repryse and braule; and ye ought fyrst to make reuerence towarde the lady, and than make II syngles, I double, a repryse and a braule.

Later on he amplifies this:

> Fyrst ye ought to make reuerence with the lyfte fote, and than a braule with the ryght fote, than two syngle paces, the fyrst with the lyfte fote and the seconde with the ryght fote in goynge forwarde, and ye must reyse your body.
>
> The fyrst double pace is made with the lyft fote in reysynge the body, steppynge III paces forwarde lyghtly, the fyrst with the lyfte fote, the seconde with the ryght fote, and the thyrde with the lyft fote as the fyrst.
> A repryse alone ought to be made with the ryght fote in drawynge the ryght fote bakwarde a lytyll to the other fote.
> And ye ought to wyte that in some places of fraunce they call the repryses desmarches, and the braule they call congé, in englysshe leue.

This short account of the base dance, of which only extracts are given above, ends with seven examples, in which the different steps are indicated by letters, R standing for "reverence," s for single, d for double, and so on: to each example is prefixed the name of the tune to which it is to be danced. Four of these are "of four measures"—viz., "Filles à marier," "Le petit rouen," "La brette," and "La royne"; "La gorrière" and "La allemande" are each of three measures, and "Amours" of two only. The tunes themselves are not given, probably owing to want of the necessary type, for it must be remembered that no secular music had yet been printed in England; Wynkyn de Worde's "Boke of xx Songes" did not appear till nine years afterwards. At a later date the base dance was always of three measures, and "Thoinot Arbeau" is careful to remind his pupil that many of the old tunes must be altered to meet this requirement.

The braul as a step in the base dance is quite distinct from the independent dance of the same name. Copland does not trouble to explain it, but in the "Orchésographie" it is described as a movement of the body from side to side "en regardant la Damoiselle d'une oeillade desrobée doulcement et discrètement." One can picture bluff King Hal at York Place making his "reverence" to the fair Anne Boleyn, the "braul" and "oeillade desrobée" accompanying it, but alas for the "discretion"!

As to the French original from which Copland translated, I have not been able to trace any printed book at this early date; possibly he had access to some manuscript, such as the fifteenth century "Livre des basse-dances" still preserved at Brussels.

CHURCH MUSIC.

The long deferred hope, that an authoritative and comprehensive collection of the Hymns and Hymn Tunes of the Latin Church would be published, seems about to be realised. Indeed, it is asserted that such a work is about to be undertaken by duly qualified persons, and under the patronage and practical encouragement of those who are in the position to give the weight of prestige and, it may be, authority to a work which should claim the interest of the whole of the Christian world.

Such a work will be surrounded by serious difficulties, no doubt; and, to be done well, will require much thought and time. The required musical materials are scattered, and represent the growth and conditions of the art throughout a period of time covering something like a thousand years. To begin, we have the ancient Plain-song tunes, in some cases not a little confused by that curious musical ornamentation known as Pneuma; then there is the growth in the sixteenth century of the count-beat syllabic method; the outcome of the influence of the formation of time and rhythmical divisions, and note against note harmony, and of the reconciliation of musical and poetic measurements and rhythm.

Undoubtedly the most difficult task of the editor or editors of the new work will not be, as is generally the case in such an undertaking, the examination of various editions and the revision of harmonies which are often best left alone; but in the consideration of the notations which the Plain Song settings have undergone during the long ages which have elapsed since those melodic inspirations first up-lifted the hearts of listeners.

A Choral Festival was given in the Parish Church, Ashburton, on the 18th ult., together with an organ recital by Mr. H. A. Jones, at which several pieces were given for organ, two trumpets and two trombones; an imposing and effective combination of instruments.

The May service list for the Church of the Incarnation, in New York, displays the same earnestness and artistic excellence always to be noted in this typical church of the New World.

The North Essex Association of Church Choirs held an interesting Festival Service recently at St. Mary's, Saffron Walden, conducted by Mr. H. Mahon, with Mr. Hugh Blair as organist. The Parish Church, Portsmouth, has lately had monthly musical services under the charge of Mr. R. H. Turner, the organist. At the most recent of these, anthems by Sir John Stainer and Mr. Myles Birket Foster and solos by Mr. Cowen were performed.

A lecture on certain types of choir music, by Mr. Waldo S. Pratt, was given lately at Holyoke, U.S. The examples performed were interesting, including music by Michael Praetorius, Sir John Stainer, Sir George Martin, Dr. E. J. Hopkins, Hermann Kretzschmar, J. C. Knox, B. C. Blodgett, and Nathan H. Allen; an array of names both familiar and unfamiliar on this side of the Atlantic.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Though the adoption of the normal diapason as an English standard pitch is a matter which apparently gains ground but slowly, it is not without interest to note that a large number of even modern organs in our churches, if not in our concert-rooms, are practically tuned to that pitch or very nearly so. In the reports of a number of festival services recently celebrated with the addition of orchestral accompaniments, it seems to be quite common to have to call upon organists to play a semitone higher in order to bring organs as nearly as possible in tune with the high-pitched orchestras. Similar statements concerning the use of military bands with our church organs are also to hand. Clearly then, as far as music with orchestra in church goes, we are much nearer the adoption of the new Continental pitch than might have been supposed. For a long period, indeed, some of our leading organ builders have adopted a conveniently low pitch, from one or both of two motives: either making provision for the coming general acceptance of the French or providing a reasonable church pitch as a matter of independent judgment.

Of recent organ recitals the following may be referred to. One given by Mr. F. G. M. Ogbourne at St. Clement Danes, with a programme including Guilmant's Canzone in A minor, Allegretto Grazioso, Tours, and Best's excellent and too much overlooked March for a Church Festival. Mr. Herbert Olding gave a recital lately at St. Saviour's, Brixton Hill, the scheme containing Krebs's Fugue in G and a Berceuse by G. Delbruck.

At the opening, on the 6th ult., of the new electric organ, built by the Hope-Jones Electric Organ Company for St. Mary's Church, Croydon, Mr. Hugh Blair played a good selection of standard and new pieces; and some very admirably rendered vocal music was given by the Lothbury Male-Voice Choir, conducted by Mr. T. B. Evison.

The fine new organ at St. Bees, Cumberland, adds another achievement to the already long list of important instruments built by our veteran king of organ builders, "Father" Willis. The organ contains forty speaking and fourteen mechanical stops, distributed over great, swell, solo, and pedal organs. The players at the opening recitals were Mr. T. H. Collinson and Mr. F. L. Livesay. The scheme of the first-named included that fine piece of contrapuntal "lace work," the superb Passacaglia in C minor by Bach; and the list of the last-named found a place of honour for the same great master's Prelude and Fugue in D major.

The programmes recently played by Mr. H. A. Fricker, at the Leeds Town Hall, evidence good all-round work. Among other pieces given were the first movement of Elgar's Sonata in G; Mr. E. H. Lemare's new Symphony for organ in G minor; Sketch in C minor and Finale of Organ Sonata, John E. West; First Movement of Sonata in C minor, Salomé; W. G. Wood's Allegro in C minor; and E. d'Evry's Concert-Overture for organ. Mr. E. H. Lemare recently gave a recital on the Leeds Town Hall organ, playing a characteristic and attractive programme.

Mr. Roger Ascham's fifty-sixth recital in Feather Market Hall, Port Elizabeth, included pieces by Wolstenholme, Lemare, and Widor. Mr. G. Leake gave a recital, on the 13th ult., at St. Mark's Church, Southampton. His scheme included "Gothic" March (Salomé) and Berceuse (W. H. Wheeldon). Dr. G. H. Smith recently gave a performance at Sculcoates Parish Church. The music given included Suite "Gothique" (Boellman) and Smart's too little played Andante in F. Interesting recitals have also been given by Mr. T. Westlake Morgan at St. Mary's Church, Bangor, and by Mr. C. Thornton Turner at Horbury Congregational Church, Notting Hill.

The fine new organ for Norwich Cathedral will consist of five manuals, including an echo organ, with sixty-four speaking stops and twelve couplers. The instrument, which will occupy the old screen position, comes from the factory of Messrs. Norman and Beard. Another fine new instrument, this of the concert-room type, is being built by Messrs. Brindley and Foster for the Town Hall, Pietermaritzburg, Natal. It may be remembered that the previous organ, built by the same well-known English firm, was destroyed by fire. The new organ will contain sixty-one sounding stops, twenty-two mechanical movements, and a large number of pistons and pedals also for mechanical work. There are four manuals, the stops of which are wisely made to contain a large number of eight-feet registers, a pedal organ of twelve stops, including one of thirty-two feet; and there are no less than seven different pressures of wind.

Dr. P. C. Buck gave a recital in Wells Cathedral, on the 21st ult., which included "Fantasia on a choral," Liszt; "Carillon," Tombelle; Symphony, No. 8, Widor; and Sonata, No. 17, Rheinberger. A selection given on the 14th ult., at St. Jude's, Dulwich Road, by Mr. Wetton Hickin, included Bach's Prelude and Fugue in B minor and the first movement of Merkel's G minor Sonata.

At the Alexandra Palace, on the 21st ult., Mr. Sidney A. Mosdell's programme included Rheinberger's Sonata in F minor (Op. 127) and Silas's Fantasia in E minor.

THE OPERA.

No new operas have been mounted at Covent Garden Theatre during the past month, but an event has to be recorded in the revival of Bellini's "Norma." This work, which owes no little of its reputation to the number of fine singers who have appeared in it, was mounted by Sir Augustus Harris at Drury Lane in 1887, and was heard at Covent Garden in 1890, during a late autumn opera season given by Signor Lago. On the 15th ult. the title-rôle was sustained in traditional manner by Madame Lilli Lehmann, and that of Adalgisa by Signorina Giulia Ravogli, who made a welcome re-appearance at Covent Garden on this occasion, sang beautifully, and acted with her usual grace of gesture. Herr Dippel appeared as Pollio and M. Plançon as Oroveso, and the choral portions were well rendered. Signor Mancinelli conducted.

To Madame Lehmann may also be attributed the more welcome performance, on the 1st ult., of Beethoven's "Fidelio." Her associates were Miss Marie Engle (Marcelline), Herr Schramm (Jaquino), Herr Dippel (Florestan), Herr Muhlmann (Pizarro), and Herr Heidkamp (the Jailor). Dr. Muck conducted and secured an excellent ensemble.

A performance was given on the 20th ult., under the direction of the composer, of Signor Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro," first heard in England in concert form at the Norwich Musical Festival of 1896 and produced at Covent Garden on July 11 last. On the 20th ult. MM. Saléza and Plançon renewed their original embodiments of Leandro and Ariofarne, and the part of Ero was sustained by Mdlle. Strakosch. Madame Louise Homer sang the solo in the Prologue.

A new baritone, Signor Scotti, made his début at Covent Garden, on the 8th ult., in the title-rôle of "Don Giovanni," but his reading lacked subtlety and courteousness, and he appeared to much greater advantage as Amonasro in a subsequent performance of Verdi's "Aïda."

Madame Melba made her rentrée, on May 25, as the heroine in Gounod's "Roméo et Juliette," and Madame Nordica returned, on the 6th ult., as Brünnhilde in "Die Walküre." M. Salignac also made his re-appearance on the 8th ult., as Don Ottavio in "Don Giovanni."

Mdlle. Lucienne Bréval, an artist of great ability, made her first appearance, on the 16th ult., as Valentine in "Les Huguenots," and made a very favourable impression by her singing and acting in the final scene. M. Flon conducted with notable sympathy with the work.

PHILHARMONIC CONCERTS.

Dr. Joachim having kindly consented to replace M. Paderewski, who was to have been the instrumental soloist at the concert on the 1st ult., at the Queen's Hall, the opportunity was taken by the directors of the Philharmonic Society to present the veteran violinist with a silver-gilt wreath, in commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of his first appearance in public. The wreath, which had been designed by Mrs. Philip Newman, was enclosed in a case, which bore the inscription:—

"Presented by the Philharmonic Society of London to Dr. Joseph Joachim, in recognition of his incomparable talent, and in commemoration of the sixtieth anniversary of his first public appearance. June 1, 1899."

The wreath was presented by Mr. W. H. Cummings, who reminded the audience that Dr. Joachim had first played at these concerts in the year 1844, when he was heard in Beethoven's Concerto, which previously had only been performed three times in this country.

Dr. Joachim replied in English, and in expressing his gratitude to the Philharmonic Society said that the first honour it had done him was when it abrogated in his favour the law that "no prodigies need apply," and he hoped it would add to its kindness and abrogate the law that no one nearing seventy should play at its concerts, for he hoped to often play again for the Society. The orchestral works performed at this concert were Tschaïkowsky's Fourth Symphony in F and Mr. Edward German's Overture to "Much Ado about Nothing," the latter being directed by its composer. Dr. Joachim's solo was the Romance from his Hungarian Concerto, and the vocalist was Madame Emma Nevada. Sir Alexander Mackenzie occupied his usual seat.

At the seventh concert, on the 15th ult., Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Preludes to Acts II. and III. of Byron's "Manfred," originally produced at the London Musical Festival in May last, were introduced to the Philharmonic audience and achieved an immediate success. There can be no doubt that these imaginative and beautifully scored pieces are amongst the best orchestral works the composer has given us—in fact, we place them immediately after "La Belle Dame sans Merci" and the "Britannia" Overture. There is a delightful "open air" charm about the tuneful Pastorale, with its quaint effect of the jingling of cowbells ("played" without time and rhythm!), and the rush and rattle of the poetic "Flight of the Spirits" —in which some curious but beautiful orchestral effects attract attention—would appeal to any audience. The composer secured an excellent performance of his pieces, but we venture to opine that the "Flight" (Allegro con fuoco) would gain by an even quicker tempo, provided the "wind" could follow fast enough, of which we confess we are not sure. Herr Richard Strauss conducted his extraordinary symphonic poem "Tod und Verklärung," but the orchestra was by no means at its best in this complicated piece of rampant realism. We spoke at great length of the "poem" in our last year's January issue, and after hearing another performance we need not alter one word of what we then wrote. It is a work of genius, in which moments of wonderful beauty and impressiveness alternate with hideous pages, which can certainly be explained and "justified" by a reference to the composer's "programme" (he sacrifices all musical beauty if need be to a conscientious and logical carrying out of the poetic idea), but which we should nevertheless prefer not to have to endure if played with such brutal insistence as on this occasion. Our tympanum is not made of cowhide! Herr Moriz Rosenthal played Chopin's E minor Pianoforte Concerto most beautifully, and Miss Clementine de Vere sang songs by Weber and Gluck with refinement and charm. Mozart's "Prague" Symphony, of which Sir Alexander secured a finished performance, concluded the concert.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

GLAZOUNOW'S SIXTH SYMPHONY.

Time was when we built great hopes on Alexandre Glazounow. We believe in him less and less as he goes on producing symphony after symphony with the facility and rapidity of a Mozart or Schubert. To be sure, he is a great architect, and can raise a splendid monument of learning and ingenuity with anybody. But, alas! the life-giving breath of melodic inspiration is sadly wanting, and the whole astounding fabric seems foredoomed to a short life. His mastery over all branches of the technique of his art is astounding. But what astonishes us even more is the lack of self-criticism which permits him to waste his wonderful erudition on uninteresting melodic material. Even the second subject of the first movement of his latest, and, in some respects, very un-Russian Symphony (No. 6, in C minor, Op. 68), produced on May 29, lacks warmth and originality, and the symphonist who cannot invent a respectable theme for the second subject of his first movement is past praying for. But Glazounow's music is so beautifully made, the scoring is so superb, and the whole flows along on such a strong smooth current, that we can understand how easily it is mistaken for great, which, in our opinion, it certainly is not. That the work contains isolated points of beauty and interest goes without saying. These are chiefly found in the variations which do duty for a slow movement. The pompous Finale is a marvel of ingenuity in handling strange rhythms. But its length and elaboration suggest that the composer became "intoxicated with the exuberance of his own verbosity" while he wrote it. The performance, under Dr. Richter, was magnificent, yet the work was but coolly received. Liszt's A major Pianoforte Concerto, brilliantly played by M. Eduard Risler, and Wagner's "Faust" Overture and "Tristan" selection completed the programme.

SIEGFRIED WAGNER'S "BÄRENHÄUTER" OVERTURE.

The novelties at the third concert, on the 5th ult., were the Overture to Siegfried Wagner's "Bärenhäuter" and an Entr'acte and Air de Ballet from Tschaïkowsky's opera, "Voyévode" (Op. 3). The overture is not a masterpiece, but it is a vast improvement upon the symphonic poem which the young composer produced a year or two ago at Queen's Hall. It is certainly tuneful, and one of the principal themes even beautiful. A clear-cut rhythmical melody like this third Hans Kraft theme would be welcome in the work of any living composer. It is simple and "volksmässig," but that should be no objection in an opera based on fairy tales. The composer is less happy in the working-out portion of his overture, where he becomes intricate and diffuse and extremely difficult. Lovers of musical coincidences may be interested to learn that one of Herr Wagner's love themes, representing the "Ever womanly," is, up to a certain point, identical with a love theme in Mr. Edward German's "Romeo and Juliet" music! Tschaïkowsky's pieces are long, but original and fascinating, both in regard to the subject-matter and the scoring. Mr. Edward Lloyd, who was in splendid voice, sang the three great songs from "Die Meistersinger" in his best style. Beethoven's "Coriolan" Overture commenced, and Schumann's First Symphony concluded the concert.

We must pass quickly over the fourth concert, on the 12th ult., which contained only one unfamiliar piece—viz., Tschaïkowsky's Fantasy Overture "Hamlet" (Op. 67), a strenuous and noisy piece, which but for the tender and wonderfully original Ophelia music (which to a certain extent foreshadows the "Pathetic" Symphony) might easily prove tedious. Dr. Richter gave a masterly performance of the work, and in the two "Meistersinger" Vorspiele (Acts I. and III.), the "Charfreitagszauber," and Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony he was at his greatest. These were glorious readings of glorious masterpieces.

The most interesting concert of the season was the fifth, on the 19th ult., for three novelties were included in the programme and presented to a crowded audience in all but faultless style. The first was J. S. Svendsen's Legend for orchestra "Zorahayda" (Op. 11), founded on Washington Irving's "Legend of the Rose of the Alhambra." It is a poetically conceived and charmingly executed piece of programme music, agreeably melodious, beautifully scored, and undoubtedly effective in a quiet way. Rimsky-Korsakow's Suite from the opera "Snégourotchka," on the other hand, is merely an exercise in orchestration. Like all his orchestral pieces, it is a wonder in the way of new and dazzling orchestral effects, but as music it is beneath contempt.

ELGAR'S NEW "VARIATIONS."

Of a very different calibre was the one English novelty of Dr. Richter's season—viz., Mr. Elgar's "Variations on an original theme" (Op. 36). Our opinion of Mr. Elgar's gifts is by this time known to our readers, but after making ourselves thoroughly acquainted with his latest work, and listening to a splendid performance under the greatest living conductor, we say more emphatically than ever: Here is an English musician who has something to say and knows how to say it in his own individual and beautiful way. He does not pose as a "profound" and learned master of his craft; he writes as he feels, there is no affectation or make-believe. Effortless originality—the only true originality—combined with thorough savoir faire, and, most important of all, beauty of theme, warmth, and feeling are his credentials, and they should open to him the hearts of all who have faith in the future of our English art and appreciate beautiful music wherever it is met.

Too much has been made of the fact that Mr. Elgar has in these pieces endeavoured, for his own amusement and theirs, to "sketch the idiosyncrasies of fourteen of his friends," and foolish attempts have been made to trace some connection between the music and some of the nicknames (such as "Nimrod") superscribed over the several variations. This is, of course, quite a personal matter, which need not trouble the listener in the very least. Enough that Mr. Elgar's theme, which he calls "Enigma," is a beautiful and haunting melody, full of deep feeling and a gentle melancholy which seem fraught with a foreboding of some tragedy. The halting and sighing of its opening bars—

appear to us especially pathetic and affecting. What Mr. Elgar does with his theme deserves a longer notice than we can devote to the subject. Enough that the variations, fourteen in number, are as far removed from the stereotyped (and generally dreaded) form of such exercises as possible. Greatly varied and original in style, they seem to run through almost the whole gamut of expression, and grow more and more interesting and beautiful as the work proceeds. That they are of various degrees of excellence goes without saying, but there can be little doubt that the favourite will be No. 10 ("Dorabella"), an Intermezzo of such wonderfully delicate texture and fairy-like grace and sprightliness that Berlioz himself need not have been ashamed of owning to this masterpiece of exquisitely refined scoring. Of special interest are Nos. 1, 4, 7, 9, 11, 12, and 13. We seem to recognise the initials "G. R. S." of No. 11, and the furious "pedalling" in the basses seems to confirm our suspicion that this is the "picture" of a well-known Cathedral organist. The piece is full of humour and dash. No. 12, in some respects the most moving of the pieces, is a long drawn and most expressive violoncello melody, and in No. 13 one of Mr. Elgar's most extraordinary orchestral effects occurs. Above a gentle murmur, as that of the distant sea, the opening phrase of the "prosperous journey" theme from Mendelssohn's "Meeresstille und glückliche Fahrt" Overture is given as a quotation by the clarinet and "treated" in a short passage of superb sonority. The Finale is an elaborate movement, starting pp, but soon developing strength and brilliancy in a richly scored march-like strain with which anon the ritmo di tre of Variation 9 ("Nimrod," but in augmentation) is combined in a grandiose and triumphant passage which virtually forms the climax of the work. Farther on in the course of this fine movement of almost symphonic importance, the opening strain of Variation 1 ("G. A. E.") returns ppp with truly pathetic effect, after which the composer quickly gathers up the threads of his argument, so to speak, and dismisses his "subject" in a short—in fact, all too short!—Coda. And thus ends an original, masterly and poetic work, which not only grows upon one enormously, but which we are convinced more than justifies our faith in Mr. Elgar's genius and in his future. The performance was almost ideally perfect and Mr. Elgar was repeatedly called to the platform and enthusiastically applauded. Madame Brema gave an intensely dramatic and moving, we might even say "inspired" performance of the wonderful final scene of "Götterdämmerung," and Mozart's delightful "Prague" Symphony closed a most interesting—may be historic!—concert.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

But few lines are necessary concerning the series of Wagner concerts given by Mr. Robert Newman, on the 3rd, 10th, and 21st ult., at the Queen's Hall. The least familiar excerpt was the Introduction and first scene from "Das Rheingold," which opened the concert on the 10th ult., and in which the vocal parts were effectively sung by Miss Lillian Blauvelt, Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Kirkby Lunn, and Mr. David Bispham. It may also be mentioned that, on the 21st ult., the quintet from "Die Meistersinger" was finely rendered by Miss Blauvelt, Miss Kirkby Lunn, and Messrs. Ellison van Hoose, Gwilym Richards, and Louis Frölich. Concerning the orchestral playing, it is sufficient to say that the band fully sustained its reputation, and that Mr. Henry J. Wood's readings proved him to be equal to any foreign conductor in comprehension of the requirements of Wagner's music.

"ELIJAH" AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The 161st anniversary festival in aid of the funds of the Royal Society of Musicians was celebrated in a memorable manner by a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" on Handel Festival scale, on the 24th ult., at the Crystal Palace. There are not many choral works outside those by Handel which are fitted for such conditions, but Mendelssohn's oratorio is emphatically one of them, and the magnificent choruses were most impressively delivered by the choir numbering upwards of 3,000 voices, supported by an orchestra of about 500 instrumentalists. Exception might be taken to the slowness of the tempo adopted for the opening "Baal" chorus, and for that of "Be not afraid"; but this was doubtless caused by Mr. Manns's natural anxiety to secure the unanimity of attack so peculiarly important in these numbers, but so difficult to attain with such a vast body of singers. Madame Albani sang the chief soprano solos with her usual fervour, and Miss Clara Butt's fine rendering of the favourite air, "O rest in the Lord," will long be remembered by those who were present. Mr. Santley once more proved himself an unsurpassable exponent of the part of the Prophet, the power of his voice being no less remarkable than the dramatic force of his reading, and Mr. Ben Davies gave his customary effective interpretation of the tenor solos. The second quartet party consisted of Miss Stanley Lucas, Miss Florence Power, Mr. Arthur Thompson, and Mr. Franklin Clive. Mr. Hedgcock rendered skilled and valuable service at the great organ.

YSAYE CONCERTS.

It has taken some years for M. Ysaye to gain the ear of Metropolitan music-lovers, but that he has now done so there can be little doubt, and the three concerts arranged by Mr. Robert Newman at the Queen's Hall have conduced in considerable measure to this happy result.

At the first, on May 30, the chief works in which M. Ysaye was heard were Bach's Concerto in E and Mozart's beautiful Concerto in E flat, both of which were magnificently rendered with the assistance of the Queen's Hall orchestra, under the conductorship of Mr. Henry J. Wood.

At the second performance, on the 12th ult., a fine interpretation was given of César Franck's Sonata in A for violin and pianoforte, the latter instrument being admirably played by Herr Schönberger. M. Ysaye also rendered the Prelude and Fugue from Bach's Sonata in G minor for violin solo with superb breadth of phrasing, richness of tone, and executive brilliancy. Herr Schönberger's excellent performance of the first and second movements of Schumann's Pianoforte Fantasia also merits record.

The programme on the 17th ult. was exceptionally interesting. The first performance in England was given of a Poem for violin and orchestra, by Edouard Chausson, a French composer, born at Paris in 1855, but who was killed while practising bicycle riding in his garden on the 11th ult. The poem is sombre in character, in parts elegiac, and testifies to its composer not only being a gifted but an accomplished musician. The violin part was most sympathetically rendered by M. Ysaye, but he made the greatest impression by his playing in Max Bruch's

"Scotch" Fantasia. He was recalled no less than five times, and gave as an extra piece Herr Lauterbach's brilliant Study in D minor. He was heard to great advantage in Lalo's interesting and effective Concerto in E minor (Op. 20), written for Señor Sarasate, and introduced by him to England on his first appearance in this country at a Philharmonic concert on May 18, 1874. In all these works the exquisite delicacy and precision with which the orchestra, under Mr. Wood's direction, supported M. Ysaye were remarkable. Beethoven's noble "Coriolan" Overture and Mr. F. H. Cowen's pretty "Four Old English Dances" were also admirably interpreted.

MR. FRITZ DELIUS.

Until May 30 last the name of Mr. Fritz Delius was scarcely known in England, but from the talent displayed in his compositions at his concert on that date at St. James's Hall it is probable that in the near future we shall make intimate acquaintance with some of his compositions. In spite of their frequent wildness, lack of reticence, and occasionally apparent want of knowledge of the best means to secure the desired effects, they possess a boldness of conception and virile strength that command and hold attention. Moreover, although of German parentage and a pupil of the Leipzig and Paris conservatoires, Mr. Delius was born and brought up in Yorkshire, and therefore his abilities should be recognised in this country.

The programme, consisting entirely of his own compositions, was in itself indicative of ambitious aims and extensive musical knowledge. It opened with a Fantasia for orchestra entitled "Over the hills and far away," which, by reason of the expressiveness of its themes and the deft use of the instruments, created a favourable impression. This was followed by a Légende for violin and orchestra, somewhat vague in form, but picturesque and well laid out for the solo instrument, played by Mr. John Dunn.

Two remarkable movements from an orchestral suite, formed from incidental music to a drama entitled "Folkeraadet," excited much attention. The first movement given (the third number of the suite) was an Allegro energico in C, specially notable for the brilliancy of its orchestration and extraordinary treatment of the Norwegian National air. The second performed (the fourth number of the suite) illustrates a change of popular sentiment, from grief for the dead to derision on the discovery of a deception, a strange incident which is set forth with great dramatic power and sense of humour. A symphonic poem based upon a morbid story and entitled "The Dance goes on," also showed decided gifts of musical expression. Criticism must be reserved on a setting for baritone solo, male chorus, and orchestra of an incoherent poem, called "Also Sprach Zarathustra," by Friedrich Nietzsche, as some of the band parts were apparently wrong, and more than once cacophony rather than music reigned supreme. The vocalist was Mr. Douglas Powell. But although opinions may differ on the musical value of this last-named composition, and also of a long excerpt from an opera, entitled "Koanga"—in which the solos were sung by Madame Ella Russell, Miss Tilley Koenen, and Messrs. Vanderbeeck, William Llewellyn, and Andrew Black—there can be no doubt concerning the expressive character of several miscellaneous songs, which were rendered by Mdlle. Christianne Andray, for those entitled "Through long, long years" and "On the seashore" are remarkable for poetical conception and perfect sympathy with the text.

LONDON CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

CONCERTS.

Miss Anna Roeckner and Mr. Charles E. Baughan's concert, on the 2nd ult., at St. James's Hall, was chiefly remarkable for the clever compositions of Mr. Baughan. Of the many songs brought forward, attention may be drawn to those entitled "Satyr Nimble" (from his music to a Greek play, "The Maid of Artemis"), "Two birds," "A lover's dream," "Dorothy Doone," and a setting of Herrick's poem "Eternitie." In all these examples there is a vein of originality, a poetic perception, and an avoidance of the commonplace and conventional that indicate talent and artistic aims.

Mdlles. Louise and Jeanne Douste gave an artistic concert on the 6th ult., at St. James's Hall. A feature of the evening was a song entitled "Les Indolents," by Mr. Hubert Ryan, a young composer of manifest talent.

Miss Adela Verne seldom fails to show advance at her successive important public appearances, and her playing at her orchestral concert, on the 7th ult., at the Queen's Hall, attained a greater excellence than she had hitherto achieved. Her interpretation of the solo part of Beethoven's great Pianoforte Concerto in E flat was that of a matured artist, and her rendering of the Scherzo from Litolff's Concerto in D minor so delighted her audience that she was induced to repeat it. Sir Hubert Parry conducted and secured an excellent performance of the clever set of orchestral "Variations on a Hungarian Air," by Mr. William Yates Hurlstone, originally produced at one of the concerts in March last at the Royal College of Music, their performance on the present occasion confirming the opinion then expressed in these columns.

Mdlle. Otta Brony was heard in English, French, and Danish songs at her concert at Steinway Hall, on the 7th ult. She gave Goring Thomas's "A Summer Night" with the requisite sentiment, and showed command of varying styles in Massenet's "Elégie" (violoncello obbligato played by M. Hollman), in an old French air, "Ni jamais, ni toujours," and in Godard's "Reveillez vous." Of Mdlle. Brony's skill in operatic music, the Cavatina from "Les Huguenots" was an example, and the Danish ditties were decidedly quaint. Besides M. Hollman, artistic support was forthcoming from Mr. Hirwen Jones, Signor Clerici, and Mr. Hans Wessely.

Mr. Clarence Lucas's clever "Othello" Overture opened the forty-third concert of the Westminster Orchestral Society, which took place on the 7th ult., at the Westminster Town Hall. The other orchestral works were Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and Bizet's first "L'Arlésienne" Suite. Mr. Harold Garstin showed much ability as a pianist in Schumann's "Concertstück," and Miss Jeanne Smalt, a Dutch vocalist, made a successful début in England in songs by Lotti, Massenet, and Sullivan.

The Chaplin Trio concluded its series of chamber concerts at the Steinway Hall, on the 8th ult., when a refined and finished interpretation was given of Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor (Op. 66), and solos were rendered with a neatness that testified to the individual accomplishments of the Misses Nellie, Kate, and Mabel Chaplin, who form the trio party.

Mdlle. Chaminade's concert on the 9th ult., at St. James's Hall, attracted a large and appreciative audience. The entire programme was selected from the compositions of the concert-giver. Three new songs, severally entitled "Immortalité," "Reste," and "Au Pays Bleu," were sung to perfection by Mr. Plançon, and proved good examples of the gifted French composer's style. Several instrumental pieces of pleasing character were rendered by Mdlle. Chaminade and M. Johannes Wolff.

Miss Stanley Lucas and Miss Lucie Johnstone again united their talents at a concert at St. James's Hall, on the 14th ult. The first-named was deservedly complimented on her tasteful rendering of "Deh vieni" ("Le Nozze di Figaro"), and her companion did justice to "O ma lyre immortelle" (Gounod's "Sapho"). Besides their several solos the concert-givers contributed duets, their voices admirably blending in Moir's "Over the heather." The other vocalists were Madame Clara Samuell, Mr. J. Robertson, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Miss Janotha and Mr. Tivadar Nachèz furnished pianoforte and violin solos respectively.

Miss Maud MacCarthy, a young violinist of whom the highest hopes have been formed, greatly added to her reputation at her concert at St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult. Breadth of style, artistic feeling, and executive skill marked her rendering, with Miss Fanny Davies, of Brahms's duo Sonata in G, and, with Señor Arbos, of Bach's double Concerto in D minor. In a Caprice by Guiraud and three "Hiawathan Sketches" by Mr. Coleridge-Taylor (who played the pianoforte accompaniments) she further exhibited both spirit and judgment. Herr van Eweyk, a baritone, interspersed the instrumental pieces with songs by Schubert and others.

Mr. Bruno S. Huhn gave an attractive concert on the 22nd ult., at 79, Harley Street, by kind permission of Lady Jeune. He played several pianoforte pieces with a neatness and taste that bore witness to a musical temperament and good training. His assistants were Miss Stephenson, the possessor of a sweet toned soprano voice; Miss Eustis, a contralto with a good style; Mr. Rogers, a baritone, who sang with refinement two effective songs, severally named "My lady fair" and "Love's Paradise," by the concert-giver; and Mr. Gallrein, who contributed violoncello solos with his customary finish. Recitations by Madame Thénard and Miss Mar were pleasing features of the afternoon.

The Alma Mater Male Choir, consisting of Royal Academy students, displayed considerable efficiency at the concert, under the direction of Mr. H. R. Eyers, in the Banqueting Hall of St. James's Hall, on May 30. The attention to light and shade manifested throughout was productive of a very smooth and expressive rendering of Sullivan's "The long day closes." M. Sauret played violin pieces in his usual masterly manner, and for vocal soloists there were Miss Margaret Cooper, Messrs. Arthur Thompson, Whitworth Mitton, and Ranalow.

Concerts have also been given at St. James's Hall by the London Instrumental Trio, on the 2nd ult.; Miss Pauline St. Angelo, 6th ult.; Mr. G. S. Aspinall, 15th ult.; Miss Margaret Wild, 21st ult. Queen's Hall, by the Wilhelm Sachse Amateur Orchestral Society, 6th ult. Queen's (Small) Hall, by Miss Violet Wiltshire, May 30. Steinway Hall, by Mr. Victor Hollaender, May 25; Miss Mervyn Keatinge, May 31; Mr. and Mrs. Henri Seiffert, 8th ult.; Mdlle. Alice Verlet and M. Louis H. Hillier, 16th ult. Salle Erard: Miss Edith Martin, 23rd ult. St. George's Hall: the Misses Anna and Louie Lówe (chamber concerts), May 30 and 13th ult.

RECITALS.

Miss Vera Margolies, a young pianist of great promise, gave a recital on May 29, at St. James's Hall, and played Schubert's Fantasia (Op. 15) and Chopin's Ballade in A flat and the Polonaise (Op. 53) in a pleasing style and with notable executive skill.

Mr. Risler gave two pianoforte recitals, on the 5th and 12th ult. respectively, but although he has a fine technique and can play with delicacy as well as great force, he was heard to most advantage in pieces of a light and florid character.

Miss Eldina Bligh, assisted by Miss Fanny Davies and Mr. Plunket Greene, arranged an enjoyable evening on the 7th ult., at St. James's Hall. Miss Bligh's playing in Brahms's terse and melodious Sonata in D minor (Op. 108) and of some solos showed her to be a violinist of taste, refinement, and ability.

Miss Tora Hwass has yet much to attain as a pianist, but her playing at her recital on the 7th ult., at St. James's Hall, testified to her possession of a musical temperament which had been well trained. We should hear more of Miss Hwass in the future.

Mr. Gordon Tanner, who secured a numerous audience for his violin recital on the 8th ult., at St. James's Hall, interpreted, in conjunction with Mr. Henry Bird, Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata in a commendable manner, and subsequently played a number of solos by Handel, Bach, and Mendelssohn with great skill.

Mr. A. Redgrave Cripps, the holder of the Erard Exhibition and Associate of the Royal College of Music, gave a pianoforte recital on the 9th ult., at the Salle Erard, at which he proved himself well worthy of the distinctions he has acquired and justified hopes of further achievements.

Miss Karen Bramsen and Mr. Henry Bramsen gave a violin and violoncello recital, on the 9th ult., at the Queen's (Small) Hall, at which they showed themselves to be well trained and talented artists. They were ably assisted by Miss Tora Hwass and Mr. Kennerley Rumford.

Herr Eugen Gura, who will be remembered by many for his fine embodiment of Hans Sachs in "Die Meistersinger," gave song recitals at St. James's Hall, on the 13th and 19th ult., at which he interpreted a number of the ballads of Carl Loewe, and others by Schumann and Schubert, with great dramatic significance.

Madame Carreño's pianoforte recitals, on the 16th and 23rd ult., at St. James's Hall, demonstrated that she is still a powerful exponent of pianoforte music. Her technique, indeed, is magnificent, and her readings possessed a vitality and brilliancy that commanded attention and aroused the enthusiasm of her listeners.

Señor Sarasate, assisted by Madame Berthe Marx-Goldschmidt, gave his two violin and pianoforte recitals at St. James's Hall, on May 27 and the 3rd ult. respectively, but as the programmes were made up of familiar works it is sufficient to say that both artists played in a most finished and brilliant manner, and that their ensemble was remarkable for its unanimity in attack and expression.

Master Vernon Warner, judging by his playing, on May 26, at St. James's Hall, is making satisfactory progress as a pianist. He certainly has musical aptitude and is evidently being well trained.

Mr. Henry Such, assisted by Mrs. Fischer-Sobell, gave an excellent violin and pianoforte recital on the 20th ult., at St. James's Hall. Mr. Such is a violinist who excites esteem by his legitimate method and earnest style, and Mrs. Sobell has a musical temperament which, combined with her neat execution and intelligent phrasing, invests her performances with interest and considerable charm.

Miss Nellie Kauffmann-Kendall, who gave her first pianoforte recital on the 22nd ult., at St. James's Hall, is a young pianist with a sympathetic touch and a refined and poetic style.

Miss Eleanor Shuttleworth is a pianist of considerable attainments, and her playing at her recital on the 6th ult., at Steinway Hall, was marked by an earnestness that promised still greater achievements in the future.

Miss Maud Agnes Winter, Associate and Scholar of Trinity College, London, gave a pianoforte recital on the 22nd ult., at St. James's Hall, and played with a decision, taste, and brilliancy that entitle her to be placed amongst the most promising of young pianists.

Recitals have also been given at Steinway Hall by Mr. C. Kennedy Scott, May 30; Miss Katherine Heyman (pianoforte), May 31; Madame Van der Veer-Green, 12th ult.; Mr. Herbert Buchanan (vocal), 13th ult.; Miss Emily Burbank and Miss Florence Mosher (lecture-recital of Russian National Music), 16th ult. Salle Erard: Miss Edith Meadows (pianoforte), May 31. Portman Rooms: Miss Clinton Fynes (pianoforte), 16th ult.

SCHUMANN'S "MANFRED."

It has been left to Mr. Charles Fry and Dr. Yorke Trotter to give the first performance in London (on the 21st ult., at St. George's Hall) of Schumann's incidental music to Byron's "Manfred" associated with the text. Great praise is due to the popular reciter and the Principal of the London Organ School for this, for it entailed the provision of a full orchestra and a capable chorus; but the large attendance justified the enterprise, and we hope will induce them to repeat it. This hope is of twin birth. It was a genuine pleasure to hear the many fine passages which the poem contains delivered with such perfect elocutionary skill as Mr. Fry commands, and the music is too beautiful to be neglected. Much might be written in its description. The Entr'acte in F and the incidental music to the invocation to Astarte are witnesses to Schumann's genius. It was in Manfred's appeal to this wraith that Mr. Fry was heard at his best. The entreaties and expressions of despair rang true and with a force and pathos that thrilled his listeners. The soloists, chorus, and orchestra had been provided by the London Organ School, and under the able direction of Dr. Yorke Trotter rendered excellent service, indicating that great pains had been bestowed on the preparation of the music. The soloists were Madame Blanche Newcombe, Miss Ethel Lowe, Mr. G. J. H. Eady, and Mr. W. Percy Herbert, and the four basses in the Incantation were Messrs. Stanley Smith, F. R. Turner, C. A. Witney, and J. Nell.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

It was quite delightful to hear some of the late lamented Johann Strauss's bewitching strains at the public orchestral concert, given by the pupils of this Institution at St.

James's Hall, on the 16th ult. Students' concerts are generally such dreadfully serious affairs. The Overture to the Viennese master's operetta "Die Fledermaus"—for he was a master and a genius!—was the last work which he conducted in public, at Vienna, a few days before his death. It may not, perhaps, represent him at his best, but it contains two of his most fascinating waltz tunes, which the students and the audience relished with keen delight. Who can resist the charm of such tunes, such rhythms, such esprit? Délibes' delicious Ballet Suite "Sylvia" seemed to suit the Royal College orchestra exactly; it was well played, which cannot be said of Brahms's first Symphony, the interpretation of which was somewhat heavy and dry. Of the soloists, Maud Gay had a difficult task—viz., Saint-Saëns's Fifth Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 103). What has this young lady done to be condemned to play such a terribly uninteresting work as this so-called concerto? Miss Gay is a sympathetic and refined player with a beautiful touch. The vocalists were Cicely Gleeson-White, who sang Schubert's great song "Die Allmacht" with orchestral accompaniment, and Ralph Courtier-Dutton, who contributed Wolfram's address (Act II. of "Tannhäuser"). Professor Stanford conducted, as usual.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The students' orchestral concert, which took place on the 22nd ult., at the Queen's Hall, under the conductorship of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, was exceptionally interesting. It was opened with a Concertstück in G (MS.) for pianoforte and orchestra, by Welton Hickin, who played the solo part. This is a cleverly-written piece, based on well contrasted and melodious themes, and picturesquely scored. Two other MS. works by students, both for full orchestra, were played—a Romance in B flat by Garnet W. Cox and a Valse Brillante by William H. Reed. The former work is based upon a broad and dignified melody, which possesses character and significance. The development is terse and rational, and the instrumentation is well nourished. The valse is a melodious, rhythmic, and very creditable composition. A scene from Sir Alexander Mackenzie's "Bethlehem," well rendered by the choir and orchestra, with Gertrude Drinkwater and R. Whitworth Mitton as soloists, gave rise to feelings of regret that this work should be neglected, and some interest was attached to the performance of the Finale to the first act of Spohr's "Azor and Zemira," in which Ethel M. Wood, Kate Williams, Julia Franks, Herbert Bagnall, and Ernest Torrence took part. A performance of exceptional excellence was Vera Margolies' rendering of the pianoforte part of Tschaïkowsky's Concerto in B flat minor (Op. 23), and other executants who merit praise were Lilian Cook (violinist), Edith Nutter, and W. R. Maxwell, vocalists.

The Royal Academy Musical Union gave a most successful "musical evening" on the 19th ult., in the concert-room of the Academy, to an overflowing audience. The programme included a new String Quartet by Mr. Percy H. Miles (Mendelssohn scholar), played by the composer and Messrs. Shea, Tertis, and Withers; vocal quartets from Professor Stanford's new Tennyson cycle, sung by Miss Florence Gill, Miss Mary Scott, Mr. Edward Barrow, and Mr. George Clowser; pianoforte solos by Mr. Claude Pollard; vocal solos by Miss Greta Williams; and flute solos by Mr. Carl Steiner. Of special interest was the quarrel scene from the "School for Scandal," given with great spirit by the veteran Mr. W. Farren and his talented pupil, Miss Annie M. Child.

THE LINCOLN MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

During Dr. G. J. Bennett's comparatively short tenure of the organistship at Lincoln Cathedral, he is said by those who know the city to have given a very decided fillip to its music. Occasional visitors, who do not appear in Lincoln much more frequently than on the triennial occurrence of its "Oratorio Festival," have but a small opportunity of gauging the progress of strictly local music, for Lincoln, like some older and larger festival towns, is compelled to go beyond its borders to organise a chorus and has to go very far afield to secure an orchestra. Still, it is possible to see in programmes, as well as performances, evidence of progress, and this was, I think, abundantly manifested at the festival held on the 7th and 8th ult. In the first place, there was, in addition to the customary two performances in the Cathedral, a concert of purely orchestral music. It might seem a trifle incongruous to open an "Oratorio Festival" with a secular concert of instrumental music. Any sentimental objection was, however, more than outweighed by the obvious advantage of giving the Lincoln people a chance of listening to modern orchestral music played by a band three-fourths of whom were London players. The creation of a taste for such music is the best of all methods for ensuring its supply, and public opinion is hardly like to be ripe enough to demand the establishment of local orchestras until the public realise their capabilities and powers.

Certainly no one could quarrel with the programme. While it consisted, with but one exception, of things familiar to the average concert-goer, it was sufficiently representative and varied, and its moderate length was by no means its smallest attraction. Beethoven's C minor Symphony was the centrepiece, and, in spite of some wavering in the matter of speed, was, on the whole, adequately presented, the Andante being especially enjoyable. Then we had two familiar and safe Wagner pieces, the brilliant "Meistersinger" Overture opening the concert and the stormy concert arrangement of the "Walkürenritt" ending it. Grieg's first "Peer Gynt" Suite and two movements from Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé" were as the piquant entrées in the banquet. Of more than local interest was Dr. Bennett's own contribution, the Overture to Shakespeare's "Cymbeline" which was first heard at the London Philharmonic Society concert on May 17, 1895, when it appeared under the title "Leonatus and Imogen." The older name points to the fact that the work concerns itself with the two chief characters of the drama, rather than with its action generally. It is a composition so full of grace and fancy, so finished in workmanship, so happy in its orchestral colouring, as to give cause for a legitimate grievance that its author has composed so little. There were not a few prophets who, even in his student days, foretold a successful career for him as a composer; he should not belie their auguries. The overture was well played, if some of the details in the working-out section might have been clearer, and the composer was cheered very heartily by all present, the members of the band being the ringleaders, which may be taken as a sign that, at any rate, their parts were gratefully written.

On the following day the scene was shifted to the nave of the Cathedral and the chorus brought into play. This consisted of over 400 singers, who came from the Cathedrals of Lincoln and Peterborough and the choral societies of Lincoln and Nottingham. With a band of ninety-two this formed a very respectable force of 500 performers, whose ensemble had a fine and impressive, if by no means overpowering effect in the spacious nave. The sopranos formed the most powerful section, the tenors were the weakest, and it was in vain that they endeavoured to hold their own by forcing their voices. On the whole, the chorus, though intelligent and well drilled, was, for its size, not remarkable for sonority. The work given in the afternoon was Gounod's "Redemption." After rehearsing all the morning, it was well for the chorus that they had no more exacting work, and certainly no fault could be found with their singing—for an obvious slip in the "Reproaches" may be counted as an accident. The principals were Miss Alice Esty, Madame Marian McKenzie, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Dan Price, and Mr. Andrew Black. Miss Agnes Nicholls and Messrs. Dunkerton and Woodward were most efficient in minor parts.

Brahms's "German Requiem," surely the noblest oratorio of the century, formed the chief feature of the evening performance, and indeed of the festival. Though its difficulties are enormous, the chorus seemed thoroughly familiar with their task, and sang with care and intelligence. Unfortunately, a morning's full rehearsal and an afternoon's performance had wearied them, and they had not the vigour or weight of tone necessary to do full justice to so exacting a work. The more impressive portions wanted weight, the more jubilant ones lacked energy. Dr. Bennett, too, was slightly inclined to hurry, the great funeral march in the second movement having scarcely the magnificent solemnity that should characterise it. Still, it was a careful and interesting performance, that was a credit to the festival, and raised it to a higher level than that attained by the best of its predecessors. The soloists were Miss Esty and Mr. Andrew Black, who sang very earnestly and expressively. Afterwards, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" ended the festival pleasantly enough, winning, no doubt, much more general sympathy and approval than Brahms's more austere music. Miss Esty, Miss Nicholls, and Mr. Lloyd were the soloists, Dr. Bennett conducted most ably, and, after each performance, Dr. G. F. Huntley played a selection of pieces on the new Willis organ. The organist at the specially built instrument in the nave was, as usual, Dr. Keeton, of Peterborough.

SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIRS.

The annual festival of Church Sunday Schools took place at the Crystal Palace, on the 10th ult., with the accustomed success. The most important event was the concert on the Handel orchestra by a choir of 5,000 voices, representing over 100 schools, conducted by Mr. H. Davan Wetton, with Mr. Harry Morgan as assistant and Mr. F. W. Belchamber as organist. The sacred part of the selection comprised works by Handel, Barnby (the anthem "Break forth into joy"), Garrett ("The Lord is loving"), Stainer ("The golden shore"), Sullivan, and Somervell, each of which received a very fair amount of justice. Later, the "Gipsy chorus" from Weber's "Preciosa" was brightly rendered, and a very popular item was Gaul's action song "The Union Jack." In the choir competition preceding the concert honours were gained by contingents from St. John's, Holloway; St. Matthew's, Fulham; and St. Peter's, Holloway.

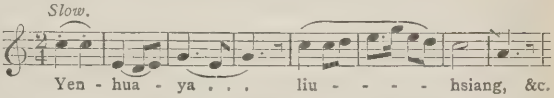
The London Sunday School Choir—the pioneer of kindred associations—celebrated its twenty-seventh annual festival at the Crystal Palace, on the 20th ult. The number of singers competent to take part is so large that it has become the rule on these occasions to give two concerts on the Handel orchestra. The first of these was by 5,000 juveniles, who, under the direction of Mr. J. Rowley, spiritedly sang a number of homely and humorous pieces. Later their places were taken by about 4,000 adults, to whom was assigned a more substantial programme. "Be not afraid" ("Elijah"), "To God on High" ("St. Paul"), and the anthems "Lift up your heads" (John L. Hopkins), "Sing to the Lord of Harvest" (J. H. Maunder), "Come unto Me" (Warwick Jordan), and "There's a green hill" (Lord H. Somerset) were in the sacred selection. Following these came Garrett's part-song "Home is home," Pearsall's "When Allan-a-Dale," G. A. Macfarren's "Break, break," and the choral epilogue from "The Golden Legend," "God sent His messenger." With Mr. William Whiteman as conductor all these pieces obtained satisfactory renderings.

THE NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

The Nonconformist Choir Union held its eleventh annual gathering at the Crystal Palace on the 17th ult. Provincial districts (especially Yorkshire and Lancashire) as well as the Metropolis and the suburbs were adequately represented. In the challenge shield contest Dr. McNaught awarded the prize to the choir of the Bilston Wesleyan Chapel, which gave later an excellent rendering of Henry Leslie's part-song "Homeward." The second prize went to Rushden Old Baptist, and the prize in Class B (small choirs) to Denton (Manchester) Hope Congregational. At the afternoon concert a choir numbering upwards of 4,000 and a band of over 100 were associated under the conductorship of Messrs. E. Minshall and J. R. Croger. Mendelssohn's "Festgesang," J. C. Marks's "O praise the Lord," Smart's "Lift the trumpet," and Handel's "Fixed in His everlasting seat" were given with admirable firmness and attention to detail. The previous standard of ability was maintained throughout the concert, which reflected credit upon all concerned.

THE MUSIC OF INDIA AND THE EAST.

On May 20 and 27 and the 3rd ult. Mr. Edgar F. Jacques delivered a course of lectures, at the Royal Institution, on "The Music of India and the East, and its influence on the Music of Europe." In the first lecture he dealt with the music of the East generally, emphasising the difference between its typical varieties, which, he urged, were to be found, on the one hand, in the music of China, Japan, Java, Siam, and other portions of Eastern Asia, and, on the other, that of India, Persia, Arabia, and Asia Minor. The tonal system of the former was comparatively simple (being for the most part pentatonic), and its appeal mainly sensuous; the tonal system of the latter was highly complex (chromatic to a degree), and its appeal chiefly emotional. That the emotional element was not, however, totally wanting in the "sensuous" music was proved by the performance of two of the finest examples of Chinese music known to the lecturer—the "Guiding March," played as the Emperor enters the Temple of Confucius, and a popular song, known as "The Haunts of Pleasure," in which a girl bemoans her fate and bitterly reproaches her parents for selling her as a child to a life of infamy. The former (played on the pianoforte) impressed by its dignity; the latter (sung by Miss Ethel Wood) moved by its intense pathos. Subjoined are its opening bars:—



The complex and emotional type of Eastern music was most characteristically and completely exemplified in the music of India, that of the South in particular. The lecturer here spoke warmly of the splendid services rendered to Indian musical art by Rajah Sir S. M. Tagore, of Calcutta, Captain Day, and Mr. Mudaliyar, of Madras. These gentlemen had, by their various publications and lectures, made clear to ordinary musical readers the most complicated musical system yet elaborated on this planet—that of Southern India. The seventy-two modes of the Hindoos, their varieties of "melody-types" (or "Ragas") —amounting, at the lowest computation, to over thirty thousand; their immensely complicated rhythms, and their musical instruments were then described—the latter being illustrated by the fine series of water-colour drawings by Mr. W. Gibb (prepared for Captain Day's book), which had been kindly lent for the occasion by Messrs. Novello; and a number of the finest pieces of Karnatic (sacred and classical) music—mainly from the compositions of Tyagarajayya (so far India's greatest composer)—were sung by Miss Wood and Mr. F. B. Ranalow.

The interest of the second lecture was greatly increased by the exhibition of three pianofortes, kindly lent by Messrs. Broadwood, which Mr. Hipkins had had tuned to illustrate some of the peculiarities of Eastern tonalities. Six different tunings were exemplified—viz., the Siamese equal heptatonic; the Javanese "Salendro," or equal pentatonic; the Arabic wind instrument scale (the same as that of the bagpipe); two Hindu scales containing quarter-tones; and a scale tuned in "just" intonation (i.e., untempered). The characteristics of these having been explained and demonstrated, the lecturer next drew attention to some remarkable similarities existing between the famous Greek "Hymn to Apollo" (see The Musical Times, "Jubilee Number," June, 1894), which was discovered at Delphi in November, 1893, and a Japanese melody, "The Bells at Dawn," published at just about the same time in Mr. Pigott's book "The Music of Japan." The similarities in question were found in the recurrence of certain melodic progressions typical of several Eastern scales, and their existence in a Greek hymn 2,000 years old and a Japanese melody of the present day testified not only to the antiquity and permanence of Eastern musical habits, but also to the width of the area over which such influences had obtained sway. The more popular music of India was then illustrated by Miss Wood and Mr. Ranalow. Most of the specimens were taken from the collections made by the Rajah Tagore, among them being a setting by the Rajah himself of some lines, "Hail, noble Prince," sung before the Prince of Wales on the occasion of his visit to Calcutta. Coming farther West, Mr. Jacques gave a brief sketch of the salient characteristics of the musical systems of Persia and Arabia, and, in exemplification, brought forward several songs and instrumental pieces. One of these—from Teheran—might easily have passed for a composition by Chopin. A sketch of the music of Asia Minor and of the modal system of ancient Greece was next attempted, and attention drawn to such points in the latter as showed affinity with the scales of India and the far East. Strabo had hinted that the Greeks obtained their musical system from India, and there seemed little reason to doubt the statement if we did not take it too literally and infer a direct communication between India and Greece. At the close of the lecture many of the audience stayed to examine the tunings of the various scales referred to above, and to address questions concerning them to Mr. Hipkins, who had very kindly placed himself at the lecturer's disposal for that purpose.

The scope of the third lecture may be gathered from its syllabus, which was thus set forth: "Greek music, ancient and modern—Turkish music—Ancient Rome and the Early Christians—The Jews—The Barbarian Invasions—The Moors in Spain—The Music of the Roman Church—The Crusades—Troubadours and Trouvères—The Gipsies in Hungary, &c.—The Slavonic nations—Austrian music—The Celtic nations: Ireland, Scotland, Wales, and Brittany."

At the outset of his remarks the lecturer laid much stress on the predilection shown by various nations for certain modes. Even the Indians, who possessed them all, showed a marked preference for melodies written in the mode "Máyamâlavagaula" (C, D♭, E, F, G, A♭, B, C), which, owing to the prevalence of semitones, had a peculiarly plaintive effect. This series of sounds was much favoured throughout the East, and was, of course, partly reproduced in the European "harmonic minor" scale. The Greek mode par excellence was that known to them as "Dorian" (E, F, G, A, B, C, D, E), and to mediæval musicians as "Phrygian" (Church mode, No. 3), and this was found to be popular in many parts of the South of Europe, and was even to be traced, though much less frequently, in the North of that continent. Illustrations were then given of Greek music, ancient and (comparatively) modern. Of the former Mr. Ranalow sang the hymns to Calliope and Helios, and the melody discovered a few years ago engraved on a pillar at Tralles. For the modern specimens M. Bourgault Ducoudray's famous collection was drawn upon, three songs from it being given by Mr. Ranalow and three by Miss Wood. These gifted young artists also sang specimens of the folk-songs of Italy, Spain, Brittany, Russia, Morocco, and Arabia, in which the modal peculiarities described above were plainly shown, as they were also in several Turkish melodies played on the pianoforte by the lecturer. The Greek modes had of course been preserved and propagated throughout Europe in the music of the Roman Church, and in this too, oddly enough, had been preserved the principle of the "melody type" shown in the Indian Ragas. Thus, for instance, M. Gevaert had, not long ago, analysed over a thousand antiphons composed in the Middle Ages, and still sung daily in every part of the world; and these, he found, were reducible to forty-seven root themes (or melody types), some even of these being derived from others.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF THE HIGHER BEAUTY OF MUSIC.

The paper bearing the above title read by Mr. Joseph Goddard, on the 13th ult., before the Musical Association, may be described as an endeavour to account for the causes of the emotional effects produced by music. The lecturer, in his opening remarks, asked: "How is it that an arbitrary, humanly devised form rises to the ineffable beauty of inspired music? How comes it about that man, in the sphere of his own creation, without borrowing any form, 'cast by nature's heavenly hand,' is able to stir such emotion as that which fine music creates?" The lecturer suggested as possible answers the influence of language on music, and hereditary associations. Music, he said, might be defined broadly and briefly as "an effect consisting of musical sounds with a tendency to symmetry in their arrangement." The singing of birds was generally regarded as something approaching to music, yet it differed essentially in character. The charm of the songs of birds resided in a "certain combination of qualities involving a departure from the conditions of musical effect with suggestions of music."

Again: "Only in human language do we find a tendency to tonal symmetry bearing an appreciable likeness to that which music involves. Thus, inflection or modulation of the voice in language resembles melodic change in music so far that it involves change of pitch producing certain expression; the time a syllable is dwelt upon in language might be regarded as a rude likeness of value or length of note in music; similarly, the pause in language might be looked upon as a rude likeness of the rest in music; accent in speech is not only the same principle of effect as accent in music, but in the metres of poetry it assumes forms precisely similar to certain forms of time in music; the regulation of speed of utterance in language is obviously the same principle of effect as pace in music. We know that whilst the foregoing rudiments of effect have in language no independent existence, they are in music extended and developed into independent forms. Yet they are connected organically in language—they define a certain form, though it can have no existence apart from the language. This is strikingly instanced in fine elocution. The elocutionist of genius adds to the language he utters a special influence. It may almost be said that he sets language to elocutional effect as definitely, if not as deliberately, as a composer sets his text to music.

"Certain forms of plural utterance in life appear in music transfigured and beautified. When, for instance, themes answer one another, dialogue and discussion are suggested; whilst in choruses, the shouts, exclamations, and expressions of a crowd may be reflected. It is scarcely possible to over-rate the importance of the approach of language and music. Its cause is, of course, the fact that language and vocal music involve largely the same machinery in us for their production, and fall within one broad region of our sensibility. This statement alone suggests that music must owe much of its influence to language, and the suggestion becomes stronger when we consider that language is a fundamental faculty—that every individual uses it and is more or less moved by it. This is why language influences music more than music influences language. One may be a great and moving speaker without being particularly sensitive to music. But every musician has some experience of the use and power of language. Thus it is that every composer is to some extent influenced in his work by his feeling for language."

With regard to the influence of heredity, the lecturer quoted as follows from Darwin's hypothesis: "Music arouses in us various emotions, but not the more terrible ones of horror, fear, rage, &c. It awakens the gentler feelings of tenderness and love, which readily pass into devotion. . . . It likewise stirs up in us the sense of triumph and the glorious ardour for war . . . the sensations and ideas thus excited in us by music or expressed by the cadences of oratory, appear from their vagueness, yet depth, like mental reversions to the emotions and thoughts of a long past age."

We realize the deep suggestiveness of this hypothesis when we consider the extensive backward range of sentient being throughout which sensitiveness to sound more or less musical has not only existed, but has been of capital importance. This hypothesis seems to throw light upon the indefinable power of nature and art, by suggesting that our sentient capacity is far deeper and more varied than we should otherwise conceive. For if the varied feelings that throbbed through former lives for countless generations are not passed quite away, but re-arise in fainter tremors and changed complexions, how deep and complex must be the conditions of feeling within us!—what a vast potentiality of feeling do we inherit!—what a world within us have nature and art to illumine!

Sir Arthur Sullivan's "H.M.S. Pinafore" was successfully revived at the Savoy Theatre, on the 6th ult., when the composer conducted an excellent performance of this delightful work.

REVIEWS.

A Study of Wagner. By Ernest Newman.
[Bertram Dobell.]

Mr. Newman in his preliminary chapter accounts for the opposition to Wagner by the critics of former days: they were "hidebound in tradition, steeped in conventional formulas." And he points out that the very composers whom these critics held up as models "were in their own day subjected to the same misunderstanding and the same abjurgation." Yet he hopes for an "attitude of completer tolerance towards the next great development of music." His hopes, we fear, are vain; we would even add, foolish; for the opposition which genius always meets with is natural and, in so far as it is honest, profitable.

It was Beethoven's music which led Wagner to his new art, or rather, as the latter termed it, the "all-puissant error" of that master with regard to the nature and function of music. Beethoven, says Wagner, tried to make music something more than an art of expression; he tried "to reach the artistically Necessary within an artistically Impossible." Now we think Wagner's view exaggerated, and Mr. Newman's opinion of Beethoven's music erroneous, so that between the two there is a strange tangle. Wagner's view appears to us exaggerated in that Beethoven's continual endeavours to make of music something more than an art of expression might have led him, had he lived longer, to new forms, yet not to what Wagner means by his "artistically Necessary." After the Choral Symphony Beethoven returned to pure instrumental music. But if Wagner exaggerated the meaning of that symphony, Beethoven's ever striving more determinedly, as he advanced in his art-career, to reproduce in tones "pictures" in his mind, naturally made a deep impression upon one who from early days associated music with definite scenes and emotions.

But why does Mr. Newman assert that "neither the mass of men, nor, we may say, Beethoven himself, ever infused into this music—i.e., his symphonies—as they listened to it, conceptions of a 'poetical basis'"? Our author may possibly be correct as regards "the mass of men," but the Beethoven Conversation Books, statements made at various times by the composer with regard to the nature of his works, and many remarks of Schindler,' all distinctly point to the fact that Beethoven's music had a poetic basis. Let us quote Mr. Newman once again: "He (i.e., Wagner) imagined Beethoven to have had before his eye a definite poetical content that in truth existed nowhere but in Wagner's own brain." Beethoven once told Neate that he always had a picture in his mind to which he worked. And about this time, when a proposal was made by Hoffmeister to the composer to issue a new edition of his pianoforte music, Schindler tells us that the master conceived the intention of indicating the poetic idea (poetische Idee) underlying his various works.

"There can be no question, in any case, that Wagner allowed the musician in him to dominate the poet just as much as did Gluck or any previous composer. The extent of the dominance was the same; the form of it alone had altered." Thus Mr. Newman, and on this text he discourses at length. At times Wagner did so, and intentionally, and in like manner the poet in him sometimes dominated the musician. By fusion of the arts surely Wagner did not mean that the interest was always to be equally divided between music and poetry! Wagner's music has been so much played in the concert-room that the musical side of his nature is apt to dominate us even when listening to his music-dramas; and in many this tendency is strengthened by a very prevalent habit of listening to the music of operas, and paying little or no heed to the text. It is quite open to discussion whether Wagner's poetry is as interesting as his music; whether the "philosophy" in his dramas makes or mars them; whether in his crusade against the conventions of the opera he did not fall at times into extremes. But except at moments, and intentionally, we do not think it can be said that Wagner "allowed" the musician to dominate the poet. Mr. Newman quotes what he calls "bald, disjointed prose" from "Tristan," and this he finds set to "exquisitely beautiful music." To Wagner, however, it can have appeared neither prose, nor bald, nor disjointed; and then some judges differ from Mr. Newman's estimate of the lines. Our author, by the way, tells us that "Tristan" is "almost an ideal poem for music-drama," yet, on the same page, he says the words cannot be described as poetry, but merely as "words intended for music." Mr. Newman considers the scheme of the "Ring" "essentially a childish one." The "superb music" of "Tristan" is to him the only thing of interest in that work. We can quite understand difference of opinion with regard to the philosophy of the "Ring," or the interest or ethical value of the "Tristan" tale. But when Mr. Newman tells us that what saves the drama "Parsifal" is "the music, that unapproachable music, the peculiar colour of which was never seen before, even in the work of Wagner," we can only throw up our hands in astonishment! If there is one work more than another of Wagner's in which the music is felt to be only one factor contributing to the effect produced, it is "Parsifal." The music was performed at the Albert Hall some years back, and although a passage here and there, such, for instance, as the Good Friday one, proved effective, the general impression was one of tediousness. In like manner the close of the first act when given at concerts, however well it may be performed, counts for little. If Mr. Newman does not admire the work as a whole, he is perfectly justified in saying so; but if it is really concerned with "concepts which have no place in modern thought, and should have none in modern art," then no music, however magnificent, could save it. Mr. Newman finds the "intellectual message" of "Parsifal" unsatisfactory; the message, however, seems to us scarcely of an intellectual nature.

Mr. Newman regards Wagner, towards the close of his life, as a sufferer glorifying suffering. With regard to suffering he declares that it "came to him (Wagner) now in the light not of an anomaly, an alien strand of darkness in the joyous web of human life, but of a sad inevitable necessity, something inwrought into the very constitution of the universe, and pointing out to us its own way of alleviation by the pity that is born of it." In other words, Wagner was imbued with the spirit of Christianity. And if not to Mr. Newman, to very many this constitutes the greatness of "Parsifal."

We have only been able to touch upon one or two points in this volume, which, however one may differ from the author, is well worth reading. Mr. Newman is no superficial student of Wagner.

Old Violins. By the Rev. H. R. Haweis.
[George Redway.]

There can be no doubt about the favourite hobby of the Rev. H. R. Haweis. It is the violin. In the attractive volume before us he writes with the warm emotionalism of an enthusiastic fiddle fancier, and in a style peculiarly his own. In his "Prelude" he says: "What is the secret of the violin? Why is it that when a great violinist appears all the other soloists have to take a back seat? The answer is: The fascination of the violin is the fascination of the soul unveiled. No instrument—the human voice hardly excepted—provides such a rare vehicle for the emotions—is in such close touch with the molecular vibrations of thought and with the psychic waves of feeling. Consider the singular completeness and perfection of this instrument as a sort of physical and vibratory counterpart of the soul," and so on, including the observation "that the violin possesses a trinity in unity of power which invests it with a quite singular and felicitous completeness of its own." The fifteen chapters of this book (which forms one of "the Collector Series") treats of old violins and their makers in different countries, violin varnish, strings, bows, violin treatment, dealers, collectors, amateurs, &c., from all of which much interesting and curious information may be obtained. Under the heading "Prices," our author says: "If you buy at auction, always go a few pounds better than the highest bid offered by a dealer, and if you win, you will be in luck." In the chapter on "Violins in England," Mr. Haweis gives some amusing reminiscences of the late William Ebsworth Hill, "our great repairer, connoisseur, and dealer all in one," whose well known business is still carried on so efficiently by his sons. One day Mr. Haweis took a friend to have his precious

Cremona inspected by "the magician." After being roused a second time from some other work upon which he was engaged, "Hill at last laid down his tool, and taking the instrument in his hands, gave it one quick glance and a couple of taps; he then deliberately looked in its astonished owner's face, tore off the finger-board, loosened the neck, and drove a knife under the belly. The fiddle was soon in pieces, and he threw the loose fragments aside in a heap, took up his repairs again, and said he would attend to the matter by-and-bye, and the gentleman need not stop; and we got no more out of old Hill that day, who immediately became re-absorbed in his work." No wonder that the owner of the Cremona had a "rueful and amazed look" when he beheld Hill's dissecting operations. But after waiting several months the fiddle came back beautifully restored and "its owner was more than satisfied." Thus does Mr. Haweis pleasantly chat upon the instrument of his affection. Although he frankly admits his indebtedness to previous writers on the subject (including Miss Stainer's "elaborate Music Primer, 'Violin Makers'"), he presents the information here gathered together in a style that is distinctly readable and not a little amusing. Twelve plates of violins, portraits (including Paganini, Tourte, Hill, and others), a view of Cremona, fac-similes of violin labels, &c., enhance the value of this contribution to the literature of the violin.

The Willow Song. From Shakespeare's "Othello." Set to music by Alexander C. Mackenzie.

The Sword Song. From "Caractacus." By Edward Elgar.

You'll love me yet. Song for Soprano or Tenor. The poem written by Robert Browning. The music composed by S. Coleridge-Taylor.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Desdemona's pathetic song has been set by Sir Alexander Mackenzie in a simple, but in so highly expressive a manner that the words and the music seem to severally be the complement of each other, and to form a perfect marriage between two arts. Although unpretentious, the touch of the master hand is manifest, and English vocalists who sing English songs will do well to add this to their répertoires.

Music-lovers who have heard Mr. Andrew Black sing the Sword Song from Mr. Elgar's fine cantata "Caractacus" will not need to be told that this is one of the finest baritone songs of modern times, and ambitious baritones and those of vocal means—not always one and the same—will find abundant opportunity to advantageously display their dramatic abilities. Those who take the song to "At homes" should either also take their accompanist or "accidentally" meet someone there with whom they have previously arranged to accompany them, as the music imperatively demands unanimity between singer and player.

It is one of the most promising signs of Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's music that, simple or complex in design or character, it invariably possesses distinctiveness and individuality. His setting of Robert Browning's characteristic poem "You'll love me yet" will present no difficulties to the singer or pianist of average capacities, but from the first bar to the last it shows singular freshness of mind and power of musical expression. Tenors who can speak their words well and have some dramatic perception will find this a very effective song, one that will arouse and sustain the attention of the listener.

The Guardian Angel. Song. Words by E. Nesbit. Music by Liza Lehmann.

My life, my all. (Tristesse.) Song. English words by Raymond St. Leonards, French words by Alphonse Daudet. Music by Guy d'Hardelot.

[Ascherberg and Co.]

Since Madame Liza Lehmann gave us the remarkably fine song cycle "In a Persian Garden" every product of her pen has acquired importance. Guardian angels in music generally imply sleep, and in this instance the words are supposed to be uttered by a child who has been carefully "tucked up in bed" for the night. As may be imagined, the vocal part is simple and it is most suitable to a mezzo-soprano. The accompaniment consists of reiterated arpeggi, which perhaps are intended to suggest the harp music commonly associated with celestial visitants.

"My life, my all," is a song of what may be termed the intense school, in which clinging, yearning souls and pale faced moons play an important part. In this instance, however, there is method in the madness of the lover, and his protestations of devotion to the absent one are made to ring with increased truth by the force of the music. Although most suitable to a tenor vocalist the song could, without incongruity, be sung by a mezzo-soprano, only, to make it effective, the lady must be very much in earnest.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 386-395.

Recent numbers of this valuable series are No. 386, in which the Dies Iræ is impressively set by the Rev. H. G. Bonavia Hunt. The music is laid out in hymn-tune form for four vocal parts, with an organ accompaniment, which possesses some independence. The first four verses are in D minor, the following three are in F major, and are designed for a quartet or semi-chorus. With the eighth verse the tonality is changed to D major, and the first eight bars might be sung by a soprano soloist. The "Tonus Peregrinus" has been introduced for the concluding portion, which is most impressive.

No. 387 consists of the "Benedicite," set to a quadruple chant in G by G. F. Wrigley. The first half of each verse is set in unison for the voices, and it is suggested that each of these portions should be delivered by men and boys alternately, a proceeding which, combined with the second half of the verses being sung "full," would certainly secure effective variety. The chant itself is well balanced and constructed with regard to its intended use.

Nos. 388, 389, 390, and 394 are contributed by Arthur Somervell, and are, severally, settings of the Te Deum, Jubilate, Communion Service, and the Evening Canticles, in the key of F. In all these the music has obviously been designed to meet the requirements of average church choirs. It is sufficiently melodious to be easily learnt, but without approaching triviality, and the part-writing is interesting to the singers and easy to read at sight. The organ accompaniment possesses some independence, but this only occurs when two or more parts of the chorus are singing in unison, direct support of the voices manifestly having been carefully studied.

No. 391 is a setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D, by Charles Wood. To a well trained choir of capable singers this music will prove very interesting. It is not difficult, but it imperatively demands precision of attack and musical intelligence. The setting of Simeon's Song is most impressive. The organ accompaniment is also admirable.

The Te Deum, Jubilate Deo, and Evening Canticles (Magnificat and Nunc dimittis) have been respectively allied, in Nos. 392, 393, and 395, to music of a melodious and effective nature by Myles B. Foster. The key chosen is C, and the masculine character commonly associated with this tonality is found in the music. Contrapuntal complexities have been avoided, and the only vocal entrances which might require more than usual practice are in the setting of the Gloria.

A History of the Pianoforte and Pianoforte Players. Translated and revised from the German of Oscar Bie, by E. E. Kellett and E. W. Naylor.

[J. M. Dent and Company.]

"This work does not profess to be so much a literal translation as a somewhat free version of Dr. Bie's 'Das Klavier.' The author, writing as he does for a German public, naturally uses a more philosophic style than would be generally intelligible in England. Availing themselves therefore of Dr. Bie's kind permission, the editors, with a view to making the book more acceptable to English readers, have allowed themselves considerable liberty, both in omission and in addition." Thus say the editors in their preface, and they have acted wisely in this method of procedure. It is somewhat strange, though exceedingly gratifying, to find that a German writer starts a book on music with a chapter headed "Old England—A Prelude." Dr. Bie devotes his first forty pages to the domestic instrument in this country during the Elizabethan period. The drift of this "Prelude" is, "that music is at the present time flourishing more at home than in public; and that the playing of chamber compositions is more popular than the representation of huge operas." Succeeding chapters are entitled Old French dance pieces; Scarlatti; Bach; "The Galanten"; Beethoven; The Virtuosos; The Romantics; and Liszt and the present time, from which the scope and comprehensiveness of the book may be deduced. The author acknowledges his indebtedness to Prosniz's "Handbuch der Klavier-litteratur" and the new edition of Weitzmann's "History of Piano-playing and Piano-literature." He says: "Thus I have been able in this work, to the exclusion of all dry-as-dust references to authorities, to present the development of piano-literature from the point of view of culture and of human interest." In this we think he has succeeded. The book is certainly very readable; and, probably due in a large measure to the free translation of the English editors, it is unencumbered with that ponderosity which is all too repellingly characteristic of treatises in the German language. A special feature—which in itself would be a sufficient warrant for stating that the book should find a place in a musician's library—lies in the illustrations, which are as profuse as they are interesting and valuable. There are no less than twenty-three full-page illustrations in addition to upwards of 100 engravings in the text—portraits, reproductions of pictures, fac-similes, &c., including a Röntgen ray photograph of the hand of Eugène d'Albert, Bülow on his deathbed, two curious caricatures of Liszt, and many others equally varied and novel. An excellent index increases the value of the volume as a book of reference, and the last word is one of well-deserved praise in regard to its handsome get-up and general attractiveness.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Symphony in G minor. Composed by Edwin H. Lemare (Op. 35).

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

According to the definition in Stainer and Barrett's valuable "Dictionary of Musical Terms," a Symphony is "a composition for an orchestra," and this is its generally accepted indicative sense in England when applied to modern compositions. Widor and other French composers have, however, applied the term to their organ works, and so Mr. Lemare in a measurable degree is justified, although in our opinion it would have been more satisfactory to have styled his work a Sonata. The music is laid out on orthodox lines, and the design and treatment indicate earnestness of purpose and skilled craftsmanship. The first movement, however, appears somewhat dry, but amends are made in the next number, an Adagio cantabile, which opens with a graceful and expressive theme effectively treated. The Scherzo is French in style and demands considerable executive ability to do it justice. It is doubtful, indeed, if the semiquaver pedal passages could be played at the tempo indicated by the composer, and still more doubtful if so executed that they would be effective. The best movement is the Finale. This also demands considerable command of the organ, but the ingenuity with which the fugue subject is treated will prove attractive to musicians. The chief theme possesses dignity and strength, and a well worked-up climax leads to an imposing conclusion.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

On Sunday, May 28, a new cantata by Mr. S. Richards was produced at St. Mary's Church, Bearwood. The work is entitled "Jesus" and is in six parts, but only three parts were performed. The composer conducted, and Mr. H. R. Richards was at the organ. The composition is for solo voices, chorus, and organ.

The terminal concerts of the School of Music connected with the Midland Institute took place on the 8th and 12th ult. The first was devoted chiefly to chamber music, and some talented young violinists were heard. At the second concert the programme was largely made up of songs, relieved by solos on the pianoforte, violin, and organ.

At a recent meeting of the Court and Alley Concert Association, it was resolved to place the undertaking on a permanent footing. The Lord Mayor (Alderman C. G. Beale), chairman of the meeting, was asked to accept the presidency of the Association, and consented to do so. Among the vice-presidents is the Countess of Warwick, who has promised her active support to the movement. The concerts began on the 5th ult., and audiences of 3,000 people throng the larger courts in the City. The cleaning and decorations that take place in every district visited by the Association must have a good moral effect; and, hand in hand with the music, brightness and joy are infused into those hitherto dark places in this city. Three concerts are given each week.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

The series of musical afternoons at the Fine Arts Academy, Queen's Road, was brought to a termination on the 10th ult. The Spring exhibitions were in former years rendered additionally attractive by means of occasional concerts, but music during the season just closed has been more relied upon for securing public patronage than at any prior period. There were thirty-three concerts, some of which were organised by Mr. W. E. Fowler, and others by Mr. and Mrs. J. L. Roeckel.

There are no firmer supporters of the Incorporated Society of Musicians than Mr. and Mrs. Roeckel, and at a meeting held on the 3rd ult. it was announced that the amount of £75 was realized at a drawing-room bazaar held at their residence, Worcester Lawn, Clifton, a short time before. Of this amount a portion was contributed to the Orphanage of the Society and a portion to the Teachers' Provident Fund founded by Mrs. Roeckel.

The season of band concerts at the Zoological Gardens, Clifton, commenced on May 29, and Mr. George A. Webb was again appointed conductor. This year the balance of the band has been slightly altered.

The Bristol Orpheus Glee Society had an enjoyable outing on the 17th ult., and, making the Hydro at Limpley Stoke their centre, the members and friends spent the afternoon in visiting places of interest. After tea the party assembled on the lawn of the Hydro, and, under the direction of Mr. George Riseley, a programme of favourite glees was gone through, to the delight of all the visitors assembled at the Hydro, to whom this musical treat came unexpectedly. The air was perfectly calm and the trained voices of the singers could be heard at such a distance that most of the villagers came hurrying up to enjoy the sweet sounds.

MUSIC AT CAMBRIDGE.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The principal concerts this term have been, as usual, choral. On the 8th ult. Dr. Mann's Choir gave "Israel in Egypt" in King's Chapel at its annual "Festival Service." The chorus, augmented from Lynn, Hunstanton, and other places, was very powerful, and the work was impressively rendered. Miss Gleeson White, Mrs. O. Morgan, Messrs. J. Reed, W. Higley, and L. Sickert were the soloists.

The University Musical Society provided an interesting programme on the 9th ult. Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" was the principal feature. Somewhat neglected at the present time, this work well deserves to be heard, for it is full of beautiful music, even though the treatment of the subject is curiously and conventionally operatic. It requires exceptional soloists, and these were forthcoming in Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. William Green, whose efforts were beyond praise. The work, as a whole, was very well rendered. In addition, Verdi's "Stabat Mater" was given with great refinement, and Dvorák's "New World" Symphony provided an exhilarating conclusion to the concert. Dr. Gray conducted.

Two chamber concerts of the Cambridge University Musical Society call for notice. On April 28 Dr. Ernest Walker and Miss Gates gave a pianoforte and viola recital, and Mrs. Burrell was the vocalist. On May 10 Mrs. Helen Trust sang, and Messrs. C. Draper, Gompertz, Inwards, Kreuz, and Ludwig played Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, and, with the assistance of Messrs. Cordwell, Thornton, and C. Hobday, also gave Beethoven's Septet.

Organ recitals have been given at Trinity Chapel by Dr. E. W. Naylor, Mr. E. H. Lemare, and Dr. Gray. College concerts have been numerous, but, with the exception of the production of Professor Stanford's song cycle from the "Princess" at King's, and Dr. Lloyd's "Longbeard's Saga" at St. John's, they have not presented any noticeable features. The Musical Club's open concert included in its programme Bach's Triple Concerto.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The annual distribution of prizes and pupils' concert of the Royal Irish Academy of Music took place at the end of May, when the Lord Mayor, the Right Hon. Daniel Tallon, distributed the prizes. The excellent performances were sufficient guarantee of the artistic standard of the classes. Particularly to be mentioned were Miss Emily B. McCready's singing in "Mon cœur s'ouvre à ta voix," by Saint-Saëns, and Miss Annie Lord's masterly performance of Liszt's Rhapsodie in C sharp minor, which was really quite remarkable. For many years there has been a tradition of fine pianoforte playing in the Academy, and the class under the able supervision of Signor Esposito was never better than at the present time, if we are to judge by the performances of the three pianoforte pieces at the prize concert.

The musical season may be said to have come to an end on the 7th ult., when the last concert of the Dublin Orchestral Society was given. Beethoven's No. 2 Symphony was played, and demonstrated the advance the Society has made in a thoroughly satisfactory way. Six months ago such a performance would have been impossible in Dublin, but the band has already done wonders. A few solo wind instrumental artists are wanted, but so far as a good conductor can produce results they have been attained. Individual artists in the band will, of course, add immeasurably to the pleasure of listening, but that will come in time. At all events, one feels that the Dublin Orchestral Society is on the right track to great achievements, and we desire to give it every encouragement. In one or two pieces the band could hardly have played better. The "Danse Macabre," by Saint-Saëns, and such numbers of Tschaïkowsky's "Caisse Noisette" Suite as were practicable, were really finely played. So also was the "Poem," by the conductor of the Society, Signor Esposito, which won a memorial prize for Carl Oberthür at the recent Feis. The "Poem," we notice, has been scored for a fuller band than in its original form, which adds considerably to the effect of the piece; but it is at all times a charmingly melodious, although frankly modern, piece of writing, and should find a place in orchestral programmes outside Dublin.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

Advantage was taken of the Norwich Philharmonic Society's closing concert of the season, which took place on May 24, to produce a new Overture from the pen of Dr. Horace Hill, the conductor of the Society. Although No. 6 of a series of nine similar compositions, it had never before been played in its entirety. Dr. Hill's acknowledged skill as a sound musician appeared in every bar, especially in the opening Andante, a melodious movement leading to a bright Allegro. Here the principal subject, as well as a second introduced later, receives a thorough working-out, and a spirited Coda brings the work to an animated conclusion. The band gave themselves heartily to the work, which, it may be added, is not easy, and the composer had to return to the platform in response to the applause of the audience. The "Scotch" Symphony, the Overture to "Zauberflöte," and Gounod's "Marche Solennelle" were also most creditably played. Miss Ulrikka Wiley and Mr. S. H. Burton were the vocalists, while Mr. F. W. B. Noverre was principal violin.

Sterndale Bennett's "The May Queen" formed the principal feature of a concert at Noverre's Room, Norwich, on the 1st ult., by the recently formed Choral Society in connection with the local habitation of the Primrose League. Mr. C. B. Fosberry conducted a successful performance, in which the principal parts were filled by Miss H. Creasey, Miss Amy Howitt, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. Daines, a small, capable band led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre being responsible for the accompaniments.

An instance of the spread of music recently occurred at Sprowston, a large village just outside the Norwich boundary. On the evening of May 30 the Parish Schoolroom was crowded with an audience attracted by the announcement that the Sprowston Choral Society would perform Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," and under the direction of Mr. B. Hilder the ordeal was passed most creditably. Miss Daines undertook the solo part, and Mr. Blount presided at the pianoforte. The string orchestral parts were partially filled, but a stronger body of instrumentalists was desirable.

The nave of Norwich Cathedral having been unflaked and thoroughly renovated at the expense of Sir Samuel Hoare, Bart, M.P., a special re-opening service was held therein on May 26, when a full orchestra and augmented choir gave the first part of Haydn's "Creation," conducted by the Cathedral organist, Dr. Bates. The soprano solos were sung by choristers, Smith, Daynes, and Day; Mr. H. J. Brookes being responsible for the tenor music, while the bass was divided between Messrs. Brockbank and Daines.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

On the 2nd ult. the pupils at the Church of Scotland Training College gave a performance of "Hiawatha" before Sir John Stainer and Dr. McNaught, the examiners. Under Mr. Moonie's skilful direction about 250 voices gave a very creditable interpretation of the interesting work. One of the students undertook the solos, and especially in the fine song, "Onaway, awake, beloved," won well-earned applause. The accompaniments were entrusted to pianoforte, harmonium, and a quintet of strings.

The Annual Diocesan Choral Festival was held in St. Mary's Cathedral on Saturday, the 10th ult., when 650 voices, aided by accompaniment of brass instruments, were led by Mr. Collinson, organist of the Cathedral.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

The series of concerts given on Sunday afternoons at the New Brighton Tower, under the direction of Mr. Granville Bantock, are more than interesting; they have a fair claim to be considered important. Mr. Bantock has worked hard, and with success, to get together an orchestra equal to the somewhat exceptional task presented by the nineteen concerts of the series. Not only is the combination, which is led by Mr. Vasco Akeroyd, powerful numerically, but it deserves to be classed among the best orchestras yet organised in the provinces.

Although New Brighton is a considerable distance from the centre of Liverpool, thousands have hitherto found their way thither every Sunday afternoon, and the big concert-room has been crowded. The idea of the musical director of the Tower orchestra is not novel, of course; but the plan of having an extended series of concerts, each consisting of works by one composer, has never in the provinces been carried out on a scale so important. Another feature of the scheme is that the composers represented shall conduct their own works. The initial concert, when Mr. Bantock held the baton, took place last month. On that occasion we had Tschaïkowsky's characteristic Symphony in F minor, the "Beatrice and Benedict" Overture of Berlioz, and selections from Liszt and Wagner. The orchestra delighted everybody; alike in cohesion, confidence, and attack the playing left little to be desired.

The Cowen concert which followed—the chief piece being the "Scandinavian" Symphony—was equally successful; and the Dvorák concert, when Mr. A. E. Rodewald very ably took charge of the orchestral forces, more than sustained expectation. On the 11th ult. we had the programme representative of Rubinstein. To the pleasure of many the selections included the big "Ocean" Symphony. The whole of the seven movements were given. This was a performance which, on its merits, deserves much more than the passing mention that alone can be given to it here. It was in every way a worthy achievement. The French concert on the 18th ult., it may be added, was conducted by M. Camille Chevillard, of the Lamoureux concerts, Paris.

The provincial taste for the travelling virtuoso is stronger than his taste for the provinces. At the annual meeting of the Philharmonic Society the scarcity of "stars" was a subject of complaint. The committee defended themselves by saying that the virtuosi had rejected the committee's terms. The former find apparently a more lucrative field of activity in the United States. Fees that were good enough a few years ago no longer suffice, but this may lead to the appreciation of ability nearer home.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

PUBLIC concerts are never numerous in Oxford in the summer term. Towards the close of the last vacation the Gleemen, conducted by Mr. H. B. Wilsdon, performed a pleasing programme of familiar part-songs. On April 27 the Free Church Choirs gave a meritorious rendering of the oratorio "Judas Maccabæus," with organ accompaniment only. Mr. Phillips conducted and Mr. A. F. Kerry was an efficient accompanist. The fifth concert of the eighth series of the Public Classical Concerts organised by the University Musical Club took place on May 3. The committee had secured the services of the Richard Gompertz String Quartet, which gave a scholarly interpretation of Mendelssohn's String Quintet in B flat major (Op. 87), Mr. C. Jacoby playing the second viola. Mr. Leonard Borwick, who is a great favourite in Oxford, played Beethoven's Sonata for pianoforte in D major (Op. 28) with his accustomed delicacy of tone and brilliant technique. In conjunction with the Gompertz Quartet he also played the pianoforte part of Dvorák's Quintet for pianoforte and strings in A major (Op. 81). Mr. Kennerley Rumford, who was in excellent voice, sang three of Schumann's "Dichterliebe" and the "Walesgespräch," and a couple of Irish folk-songs. On May 4 the Cowley St. John Musical Society gave a performance of Gadsby's "Lord of the Isles," Dr. Dodds, of Queen's College, conducting.

On May 20 the College Invitation concerts of the Eights' week began, Balliol leading off with a mixed programme in which the Misses Hilda and Muriel Foster and the Misses Amy and Jessie Grimson took a prominent part. Dr. Ernest Walker was, as usual, the accompanist, and Mr. John Farmer conducted. At Exeter College, on the Tuesday, the College Musical Society sang several part-songs very pleasingly, the Misses Hilda and Muriel Foster contributed songs, and Dr. Rowland Winn won great applause for his pianoforte solo. Mr. R. C. W. Pullen was the musical director. Merton College gave its concert on lines different from those of recent years. Instead of a cantata with orchestral accompaniment, the College Musical Society sang several part-songs, including three by local musicians, Drs. Lloyd, Iliffe, and Mee. Miss Barter and Mr. Alison Phillips were the vocalists, and the Misses Amy and Jessie Grimson contributed instrumental solos and duets. Mr. A. F. Kerry conducted. The most important concert of the week was the concluding one at Queen's College. For forty years Queen's College has given a concert of high-class music—in fact, it was the first to offer this class of entertainment to the visitors to the University for the summer races. For fifteen years the Eglesfield Musical Society—the title borne by the body of undergraduates who sing the choral music—has devoted itself to compositions for male voices, written especially for it, and in this way it has had a marked influence on the development of the previously neglected art of male-voice music in this country. This year Professor Prout's "Damon and Phintias," originally written for and performed by the Society in 1889, was given for the second time with great success, Professor Prout himself conducting. The stirring, dramatic music was heard to the best possible advantage, with the accompaniment of a full band consisting partly of University amateurs, but chiefly of professional players. The bass solos were magnificently sung by Mr. A. F. Ferguson; Mr. Anstice, who was in excellent voice, took the tenor solos, and Mr. J. E. Healey those for a baritone voice. In the second part Beethoven's C major Symphony was given in masterly fashion by the orchestra, conducted by Dr. Iliffe, the musical director of the concert. Mr. A. H. D. Prendergast conducted a charming setting of Dekker's poem "Golden slumbers," a part-song written especially for the concert. Mr. Myles B. Foster had travelled from Aberdeen expressly to conduct his two songs, "The star" and "It was a lover," with orchestral accompaniment specially written for this performance. Mr. A. F. Ferguson sang them with excellent effect. Grieg's "Landerkennung," sung by the Musical Society with Mr. J. E. Healey as the soloist, brought this very enjoyable programme to a conclusion.

A lull in matters musical followed until the 15th ult., when Keble College gave a satisfactory rendering of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," with the accompaniment of a small orchestra, and conducted by Dr. Harwood. Miss Estella Linden sang the soprano solos with good effect. Miss Price was very successful in the contralto solos, and Messrs. A. Collings and H. Sunman were heard to great advantage in the tenor and bass music respectively. The programme included Beethoven's "Prometheus" Overture.

The Sunday concerts at Balliol have been continued with great success; the chief features have been a fine performance of Beethoven's Seventh Symphony on Whit-Sunday, pianoforte solos by Miss Fanny Davies on the 11th ult., and songs by Miss Fillunger and violoncello solos by Mr. Paul Ludwig on Commemoration Sunday. The Ladies' Musical Society has given three concerts this term. At the first, the programme, which included Schubert's Quintet for strings in C (Op. 163) and Brahms's Sextet in G major (Op. 36), the Grimson family were the performers. At the second, Lady Semon was the vocalist and Professor Johann Kruse the violinist. At the third, local amateurs performed Mendelssohn's Octet for strings in E flat (Op. 20) in an exceedingly creditable manner. The product of all this suggests that musical visitors to Oxford during this term have been treated to a feast of good things.

MUSIC IN WALES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Triennial Choral Festival for the Southern division of the Archdeaconry of Merioneth was held at the Parish Church, Machynlleth, on Whit-Monday. In addition to hymn tunes, the service included a new Te Deum and Benedictus by the conductor, Mr. M. W. Griffith, Dolgelley; Magnificat and Nunc dimittis by Mr. A. H. Brown; an anthem, "Sing praises unto the Lord," by Gounod; and Handel's "Worthy is the Lamb" (sung in Welsh). The festival was well attended, and the singing generally reflected much credit on the efforts of the conductor and the choristers. Mr. Evans, Dolgelley, and Mr. Howell, Machynlleth, rendered efficient service at the organ.

On May 30 a new three-manual organ, built at a cost of £668 for St. Mary's Church, Bangor, was dedicated by the Bishop of the diocese. Mr. Bennett Jones, the organist of the church, presided at the instrument during the service. The following evening a recital was given on the new organ, by Dr. Wilson, organist of St. Asaph Cathedral; and on Sunday evening, the 11th ult., by Mr. Westlake Morgan, organist of Bangor Cathedral.

The Merthyr Choral Society gave a performance, on the 1st ult., of the "Sands of Lavan," a prize cantata by Mr. D. C. Williams, which was first produced at the Festiniog National Eisteddfod last year. The soloists on this occasion were Miss Eleanor Jones, Miss Nellie Davies, Mr. Herbert Emlyn, and Mr. Meurig James. The composer conducted, and the band, numbering some forty performers, was led by Mr. E. T. Roberts, Cardiff. Choir, instrumentalists, and principals performed their respective tasks efficiently, and the work produced a similarly favourable impression as at Festiniog.

The entries for the Cardiff Eisteddfod have closed. In all fifty-seven choirs have sent in their names, 161 vocal duets, trios, and quartets, and as many as 631 vocal soloists. The entries in the instrumental section are not so numerous, but are satisfactory; the pianoforte taking easy precedence with a total of 192. About seventy musical compositions have also been submitted. The leading musical event of the first day will be the chief choral contest; second day, ladies' choirs, glees, and chief orchestral bands; third day, second choral contest and children's choirs; fourth day, male-voice choirs and amateur orchestral bands. The fifth and last day will be devoted to brass and military bands.

Welsh educational establishments and Welsh County Councils have hitherto done but little towards the encouragement of music in the Principality; but the short course of musical study, from August 21 to September 16, just announced at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth, is a step in the right direction. Mr. David Jenkins, the lecturer in music at the College, will take the theory classes, Mr. B. Ollerhead the violin, and Mr. Bryceson Treharne the organ. Both teachers and amateurs, particularly in Mid-Wales, ought to avail themselves largely of this excellent opportunity of combining instruction and a holiday at one of the pleasantest of sea-side resorts; and it is very much to be hoped their response will be such as to induce the council to further extend the proposed course.

The orchestral concert given by the students of the Guildhall School of Music, on May 31, at the City of London School, was a decided success. The band played with firmness and precision Beethoven's Symphony in D and the Overture to Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor." In violin solos the Misses E. Gywnne Kimpton and Bertha Bruckshaw displayed considerable ability in works by Mendelssohn and De Bériot respectively. Mr. Lorne Wallet and Miss Marie Saxon secured approval for their vocal contributions, each selecting airs from "Elijah," and Mr. W. H. Cummings (the principal of the school) conducted.

The students of Trinity College, London, gave an orchestral concert at Queen's Hall on May 29. The programme was interesting both in regard to material and execution. Specially noteworthy was Miss Queenie Dando's able performance of the Allegro and Finale of a Clavier Concerto in B flat, by John Christian Bach. The neatness and ingenuity of the composition, no less than its quaintness, secured attention. Another successful pianist was Miss Maud Agnes Winter, who gave a bold and intelligent rendering of Beethoven's E flat Concerto. The Finale to the first act of Mendelssohn's unfinished opera "Loreley" was well rendered, and Dr. E. H. Turpin conducted highly creditable performances of Massenet's "Phèdre" Overture and of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony.

"Songs of Irish Life" was the subject of a concert-lecture by Mr. Francis A. Fahy, at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 6th ult. National characteristics and the reflection in poetry and melody of widely differing emotions were conspicuous elements of the programme. The illustrative songs were derived from various sources, the modern school preponderating. Among the vocalists were Miss Lucie Johnstone, Mr. Reginald Brophy, and Mr. George Thorp; and Madame A. A. Needham accompanied several of her own songs.

"An Evening with Gounod" was the title of a very enjoyable programme of music given at New Court Congregational Church, Tollington Park, on the 6th ult., by the New Court Choir, assisted by Madame Lilla Harrison, Mr. Hamilton Tetley, Mrs. A. Williams, Miss Emilie Dettmer (violin), and Mr. Donald Keir. "Gallia," "O sing to God" (Noël), portions of "The Redemption," and various songs and solos were effectively rendered under the direction of Mr. Harrison White, organist and choirmaster of the church.

The following is the order of performances at the forthcoming Bayreuth Festspiele—viz., "Rheingold," 22nd inst. and August 14; "Die Walküre," 2nd inst. and August 15; "Siegfried," 24th inst. and August 16; "Götterdämmerung," 25th inst. and August 17; "Die Meistersinger," 28th inst. and August 1, 4, 12, and 19; "Parsifal," 29th and 31st inst. and August 5, 7, 11, and 20. The conductors will be Dr. Hans Richter, Herren Siegfried Wagner and Franz Fischer, of Munich.

The new Duchess Theatre, now being erected at Balham, is to possess a two-manual and pedal (tubular pneumatic) organ. The instrument, placed on either side of the proscenium wings—over the private boxes—will be played from the orchestra. Thus some very fine effects should be obtained, especially in opera. The organ is being built by Mr. Eustace Ingram. The importance of equipping a modern theatre with all possible aids to the interpretation of music is obvious.

The military authorities have decided to discontinue the musical services at the Royal Military (Guards) Chapel, which have for so many years been greatly appreciated by the public. The professional choir will be dispersed early this month, and Mr. Richard Lemaire, who has been Precentor of the Chapel for several years, has accepted the post of organist and director of the choir of St. Barnabas, Pimlico, in succession to Mr. Luard Selby.

Miss A. E. Keeton gave three "Character Studies" at the London Organ School. On the 5th ult. (Rubinstein); on the 14th ult. (Mendelssohn); and on the 28th ult. (Tschaïkowsky). Illustrations were provided by Miss Amélie Molitor and Mr. Henry Beauchamp (vocalists), Mr. Charles Schilsky (violin), Mr. J. Edward Hambleton (violoncello), and Dr. Percy Rideout (organ and pianoforte).

The "Challen" gold medal, presented annually by Messrs. Challen and Son to the best pianoforte player of the Royal College of Music, has been won this year by Maude Gay (scholar). The medal will be presented to the fortunate prize-winner by H.R.H. the Prince of Wales at the annual meeting of the College, to be held at Marlborough House on the 3rd inst.

The Glasgow Select Choir, who have had the honour of singing before Her Majesty at Balmoral, sent an address of congratulation to the Queen on the occasion of her eightieth birthday. A gracious acknowledgment of the address, the illumination of which was the work of a member of the choir, was received from the Queen through Sir Fleetwood Edwards.

The competitions recently held at York deserve special mention by reason of the indefatigable exertions of Miss Mary Egerton, who initiated these contests and brought them to a most successful issue. Miss Egerton also conducted the choral pieces at the evening concert, which were performed with great effect.

Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Golden Legend" received a very able rendering at the Alexandra Palace, by the Palace Choir, on the 3rd ult., Mr. George Riseley conducting. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Ada Crossley, Miss Florence Lancaster, Mr. Gregory Hast, Mr. Francis Harford, and Mr. Watkin Mills.

Mr. A. Kalisch has been appointed musical critic of the World in succession to Mr. R. S. Hichens.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Basel.—The seventy-fifth anniversary of the foundation of the Basler Gesang-Verein was celebrated, on May 25-28, by a series of festival performances, including Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion and (for the first time in Switzerland) Berlioz's "Requiem"; among the soloists being Mesdames Hiller and De Haan, and Herren Messchaert and Robert Kaufmann. On account of the illness of Dr. Volkland, the present conductor of this excellent Society, the performances were conducted by Dr. Hegar, of Zurich.

Berlin.—A number of very successful performances of Max Schillings's opera "Ingwelde" was given last month at the Royal Theatre, by the personnel of the Schwerin Court Theatre, under Herr Zumpe's direction. ——A new opera, "The King's Recruit," by Max Clarus, was brought out on May 25, at the West-end Theatre, and well received.——In commemoration of the death of Johann Strauss a special performance took place, on the 7th ult., at the New Royal Opera House, of "Die Fledermaus," preceded by Mozart's "Maurerische Trauermusik," and an impressive and poetic prologue, from the pen of Oscar Blumenthal, spoken by Fräulein Poppe.——A commemorative tablet was unveiled, on the 1st ult., at the house in which (on February 2, 1857) the Russian composer, Michael Glinka, breathed his last. The occasion was marked by a concert of Glinka's music, given at the Beethoven Hall, under the direction of M. Balakirew, a pupil of Glinka.——The monument erected to Hermann von Helmholtz, the famous author of the "Ton-Empfindungen," in the grounds in front of the University buildings, was unveiled, on the 6th ult., in the presence of the Emperor and a numerous and brilliant assemblage.

Bremen.—The operatic performances of the season just concluded at the Stadt Theater, under its very active new management, included the highly successful first production here of Schillings's "Ingwelde," and the remarkable and significant fact that the highest number of performances—viz., thirty—was accorded to Mozart's "Zauberflöte" (after the Munich model); Wagner, with eight operas and twenty-two representations, coming next in numerical order. Hans Sachs's exhortation in the final scene of "Die Meistersinger"—"Verachtet mir die Meister nicht"—cannot, at all events, be said to apply to Mozart and the music-lovers of the old Hausa town.

Brunswick.—Franz von Holstein's remarkable opera "Der Haideschacht," the late poet-composer's most finished production, was revived on May 29, at the Court Theatre, with considerable success.

Cassel.—The competition of male choirs, held here in the last week of May, was a brilliant success. Eighteen of the leading German societies took part, the first prize, instituted by the Emperor, being awarded to the well-known Cologne Maennergesang-Verein. The jury included Herren Reinecke (Leipzig), Schuch (Dresden), Wüllner (Cologne), Perfall (Munich), and R. Strauss (Berlin).

Hanau.—An excellent impression was produced by the first performance, last month, on the part of the Oratorio-Verein, of a series of characteristic scenes from Sudermann's Biblical drama "Johannes," set to music, for three solo voices with orchestra, by Dr. Frank Limbert, the talented conductor of the Society.

Leipzig.—The opera "Sarema," by Alexander Zemlinsky, which obtained a prize at last year's Munich competition, was produced at the Stadt Theater, last month, with but small success.——The well-known composer, Felix Draeseke, has just completed the score of an important new sacred work—viz., a "mysterium," entitled "Christus," and dealing, in three separate oratorios and a "Vorspiel," with the leading episodes in the life of the Saviour.

Liegnitz.—The recent excellent performance, in the Church of St. Peter and St. Paul, by a mixed choir, under Herr Rudnick's direction, of Lortzing's resuscitated oratorio "Die Himmelfahrt Christi" ("The Ascension") will probably lead to a general acceptance of the work by German choral societies. The oratorio, the score of which had been lost sight of for the last sixty years, presents the composer of "Zaar und Zimmermann" in the new light of a writer of truly religious as well as charmingly melodious music.

Paris.—The birth-centenary of Halévy, the composer of "La Juive," which properly occurred on May 27, was signalised at the Opéra Comique, on the 5th ult., by the performance of "L'Eclair," preceded by excerpts from "Les Mousquetaires de la Reine," "Bocage Epuis," and "Le Val d'Andorre." A new fairy opera, "Cendrillon," by M. Massenet (the libretto by M. Henri Cain), was recently brought out at the Opéra Comique and achieved a brilliant success. The work, which is in four acts, has been splendidly mounted, and, with Mesdames Guiraudon, Deschamps-Jehin, and M. Fugère in the principal parts, continues to be a great attraction.——At the Opéra, Méhul's "Joseph"—which, on account of the spoken dialogue, had not been given here before—was at length produced on May 30, with Mdlle Akté in the part of Benjamin and MM. Vaguet and Delmas in those of Joseph and Jacob respectively. The dialogue had been replaced by skilfully-written and effective recitatives by M. Bourgault-Ducoudray, and the performance, under the direction of M. Paul Vidal, was in every way worthy of the classical masterpiece.——An interesting concert took place on the occasion of the opening of a very fine new organ at the Church of St. Augustin, on May 30, when M. Eugène Gigout, the eminent organist, played Handel's Concerto in D minor, a prelude and fugue by Bach, and Mendelssohn's First Sonata, while the choir gave an excellent performance of Bach's "Magnificat" and other works, under M. Vivet's direction.——Amidst popular festivities two monuments, erected to the memory of Léo Délibes, the composer of "Lakmé" and "Le Roi l'a dit," were unveiled on the 18th ult.; one at his native village of Saint Germain du Val and another on the promenade of the neighbouring La Flèche, on the banks of the Loire.

Prague.—A complete cycle of Wagner's operas, to which, with somewhat questionable taste, a performance of Siegfried Wagner's "Der Bärenhäuter" was added, came to a successful conclusion last month at the German Theatre, under the direction of its own very able conductor, Herr Leo Blech, and of Herr Mottl, of Carlsruhe. Excerpts from "Parsifal" and Beethoven's Ninth Symphony (conducted by Herr Mottl) worthly terminated the important undertaking, which reflects great credit upon the veteran manager, Herr Angelo Neumann.

Regensburg.—August Klughardt's new oratorio, "Die Zerstörung von Jerusalem," has been performed four times during the last few weeks by the Choral Society, under the direction of Herr Geiger, each occasion being marked by an increased appreciation of the work on the part of the audiences.

St. Petersburg.—The birth-centenary was celebrated, on May 25, of Alexei Fedorovitch de Lwoff, the composer of the Russian National Anthem, who died in 1870. He was Adjutant-General to the Emperor Nicholas I., and the composer of several operas and other musical works.——A one-act opera by the gifted young composer, S. Taneyef, and entitled "La Vengéance de Cupidon," was brought out with great success last month, at the Théâtre Marie.——Madame Sigrid Arnoldson has signed an engagement for the coming season at the Imperial Opera, where she will receive 6,000 francs per night.

Sondershausen.—The annual meeting of German Academical Choirs, taking place here in Whitsuntide, was a distinct success, both in regard to the number of singers participating and the general efficiency of the performances, which included Beethoven's "Die Ehre Gottes in der Natur," Taubert's "Der Landsknecht," and Bruckner's imposing "Normannen-Zug." Capellmeister Schroeder conducted, the orchestra being that of the Court Theatre.

Thun.—Under the auspices of a local society a commemorative tablet has been placed at the house inhabited by Johannes Brahms, during the summer months of 1886-1888, where he wrote several of his more important works.

Turin.—The première of the opera "Rosalba," by the talented composer Emilio Pizzi (the libretto by Signor Illica), which had been looked forward to with much interest, took place on May 31, at the Teatro Carignono, in the presence of a numerous audience, who received the new work with acclamation.

Vienna.—In commemoration of the death of Johann Strauss, a special performance of his most successful operetta "Die Fledermaus," in which nearly all the leading solo vocalists took part, was given on the 9th ult., at the Imperial Theatre, under Capellmeister Hellmesberger's direction.——The season of opera at the Imperial Theatre came to a close on the 12th ult. Among the novelties in course of being mounted for the coming season is the opera "Nubia," by Mr. Georg Henschel, the libretto of which, by Herr Max Kalbeck, is founded upon a novel of the same title from the pen of Richard Voss.

Weimar.—A new opera by the Russian composer E. von Vollborth, entitled "Der Glücksritter," was brought out at the Court Theatre, on May 24, and well received.——At the annual meeting of the German Goethe Society, on May 27, a special representation was given at the Court Theatre of the great poet's drama "Tasso," preceded by an excellent performance of Liszt's symphonic poem bearing the same title, and which, in this connection, was invested with a special and enhanced interest.

Wiesbaden.—Herr Louis Lüstner, the very able and popular conductor of the Cur-Orchestra, celebrated, on May 27, the twenty-fifth anniversary of his activity in that position. During that period over ten thousand concert performances of both classical and modern music have been given by this excellent institution, under Herr Lüstner's direction.

OBITUARY.

JOHANN STRAUSS.

"His death eclipsed the gayety of nations, and impoverished the public stock of harmless pleasure." This saying of Dr. Johnson's, with perhaps a slight modification, may be applied to "The Waltz King," Johann Strauss, who died at Vienna, on the 4th ult., after two days' illness, he having passed the Psalmist's allotted span of human life by four years. For three-quarters of a century the name of Strauss has been a household as well as an out-of-doors word with the light-hearted Viennese. Johann Strauss (1804-1849), the first "Waltz King," was the father of the deceased musician. His recently deceased son, bearing the same name, was born in Vienna, October 25, 1825. In accordance with the wish of his father, that none of his sons should follow the musical profession, young Johann became a clerk in a savings bank. His mother, however, had him secretly taught the violin and he studied under Drechsler for composition. He was only a child of six or seven years old when he composed his first waltz, which was revived in Vienna in 1875, on his fiftieth birthday, with the title of "Erster Gedanke." In spite of his father's desire Johann resolved to enter the profession of music. He made his first appearance as a conductor on October 15, 1844, in the beer garden of Dommayer, at Hietzing, when he played his father's "Loreley Waltz" and one or two forgotten pieces of his own. Upon the death of his father, in 1849, Johann the younger united the two Strauss orchestras. Thenceforward his fame was established and the gay Viennese looked upon him as their "Waltz King" in succession to his father. Strauss toured with his orchestra in Germany and Russia. He also visited England and France. In 1870 he practically relinquished the duties of conducting and devoted himself entirely to composition. From that date he began the composition of a series of comic operas which, whatever their merits, failed to bring him the fame associated with his waltzes, of which he wrote about 400. The most famous of these is the "Blue Danube," which has attained an extraordinary and well deserved popularity. The remains of the deceased musician were laid in a temporary grave in the Central Cemetery, Vienna, but they will ultimately be deposited between the graves of Schubert and Brahms in the musicians' corner. Wagner's opinion of Strauss may be gathered from the following remark: "One of Strauss's waltzes surpasses in charm, finish, and real musical worth hundreds of the artificial compositions of his contemporaries as the steeple of St. Stephen's surpasses the advertising columns on the Paris Boulevards." Bülow once made the suggestion that a Strauss waltz should occasionally be played at a classical orchestral concert. Why not? How delightfully refreshing such an oasis would be in the desert of music that is often so dry and wearisome.

GABRIELLE VAILLANT.

Old Academy students of a quarter of a century ago will recall the familiar form and graceful playing of the lady violinist of that time at Tenterden Street—Gabrielle Vaillant. Sharing in this pleasant recollection of a true artist and a winning personality, it is with much regret that we record her death, resulting from a severe illness following upon a carriage accident, which took place at Kew, on May 14, at the age of forty-six. A native of France, Mdlle. Vaillant came to England in her youth and completed her studies at the Royal Academy of Music (1873-76) under her fellow countryman, Prosper Sainton, who thought very highly of her remarkable talent. In this connection we cannot do better than quote, and, at the same time, fully endorse the following extract from an obituary notice in The Times: "She possessed a fine musical organisation, complete grasp of good music of all schools, and wide sympathies for both old and new compositions. Her technique was sound, and her style of the purest. Her retiring disposition and natural refinement kept her back from the usual methods of advancement in the estimation of the great public, and she never took the prominent place in the musical world to which her great talents entitled her. But the charm of her personality, her kind heart, and her spirituelle grace in conversation, endeared her to a large circle of friends and pupils, to whom her death has come as a personal loss." In the spirit of an angel of mercy Mdlle. Vaillant used to read to the late Professor Sir G. A. Macfarren; she would also play to him and send him flowers. Two charming extracts from his letters to her, written in the year of his death (1887), show a peculiarly tender side of the sightless theorist's nature. He wrote: "My dear Gabrielle, what a perfect interval are you that keep your perfection from whichever side one measures you! If you play, it is delightful, so if you send lilies, and so likewise if you say pretty things, which have infinite charm, whatever their subject." And again: "Further thanks I would send for the new gift of roses that has come to-night. You are indeed the fairy of private life, dispensing flowers and love wherever you pass." The world is all the poorer when such a fairy spirit as that of Gabrielle Vaillant is called away from its turmoil and strife.

The death is announced, at the early age of thirty-four, of James Charles Wainwright. The deceased musician, who was a native of Ormskirk, Lancashire, was an enthusiastic student of Church music from his youth upwards. He was formerly a chorister of Peterborough Cathedral and subsequently became an organist and theorist of much promise. In 1891 he was appointed organist and choirmaster of St. John's Church, Guildford, and three years later of the Parish Church of St. Neot's, together with that of conductor of the St. Neot's Choral Society. Mr. Wainwright was a Fellow of the College of Organists. He obtained the degree of Bachelor of Music in the University of Oxford in 1895, and his exercise for the degree of Doctor in Music was a fine scholarly setting of the Te Deum. Eighteen months ago his health began to fail and he retired to West Kirby, where, to the deep regret of a large circle of friends, he passed away, on the 6th ult., a victim to consumption. His compositions include organ pieces, anthems, &c., none of which, however, have been published.

We regret to announce the death, on the 7th ult., of Mrs. Richard Blagrove (née Freeth), who was well known in the sixties as an accomplished pianist. She studied in Paris under Prudent and Billet. Her first public appearance in London was made at one of Hullah's orchestral concerts, when she gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's G minor Pianoforte Concerto. She married the late Mr. Richard Blagrove, the distinguished viola player, and for many years she has lived in retirement. Her two sons are well known in the musical profession as a violoncellist and a violinist.

Philipp Lenz, for many years musical conductor and choirmaster at the Cathedral of Trèves, died there on May 25, aged fifty-one. He was a pupil of the Ratisbon School for Church Music and an esteemed composer of sacred works.

Heinrich Wiegand, the once famous basso of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater and of the Bayreuth Festspiele, well known also to London audiences, died, on May 28, at Frankfort-on-Main, aged fifty-eight.

CORRESPONDENCE.

DR. WESLEY AND THE MINOR CANON.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have been laughing at Mr. Pyne's story in this month's Musical Times about Dr. Wesley's crushing rebuke of an "amiable but meddlesome Minor Canon." But Mr. Pyne has only told half of it. As I happened to be the Minor Canon in question, kindly allow me to add the rest of the little tale.

Mind, I say nothing to grate on the feelings of any of Dr. Wesley's friends; I have far too much regard for the memory of the kind old man for that. But he belonged to a generation of Cathedral organists of a bygone day; and, like many others, he left the organ and the supervision of the music too much to his pupils, some of whom (like "Kenny Pyne") were mere boys, who did their best, but were too young to carry moral weight. In consequence of this the choir at Gloucester became at one time rather indifferent, and people in the city talked very freely about it. This was not to the credit of anyone concerned—I don't mean in a musical point of view only, but as bearing on Divine Service. So, being "meddlesome," I determined to try to amend matters; and being "amiable" I employed at first the most pacific of methods. These failing, I ventured to remonstrate at headquarters, and drew down on my small head the crushing blow which Mr. Pyne has reported with very fair accuracy. Of course I ought to have collapsed—only collapsing is not my habit. Instead, I represented matters to the Dean and Chapter: and at their request I attended the next Chapter Meeting and stated what I believed to be needed—viz., a little more personal supervision, a little fresh music occasionally by way of sustaining interest, and a weekly practice of the choir—up to that time unknown. The order was given by the Chapter, and improvement followed. In this I simply did what Dykes did long before at Durham. But Mr. Pyne's memory failed him apparently.

However, I should like to thank him for one part of his reminiscences of Dr. Wesley—I mean for naming the great kindliness of his nature. Impulsive he might be, and at the time severe, but he bore no malice. I never knew a man who more regretted a hasty speech. I never felt more humbled in my life than when he expressed his regret to me for speaking in haste (Mr. Pyne knew nothing of that; it was between ourselves alone). I learnt to love the old man's kindliness. Mr. Pyne has named his affection for his dogs. He seemed to me to have a wonderful power over animals. I have seen him go up to the Dean's two huge mastiffs, seize them by their forelegs, turn them over and over, and play with them as with children; and they entered into the fun of the thing just as much as he did. And when his own dog died the Doctor's heart was very full, and he went up into the organ loft and relieved it by a mighty wail on the organ, which startled everyone who heard it. Would that it could have been written down! People asked, "What's the matter with the Doctor?" Those of us who knew understood it—and we loved him all the better.

Ah! those extemporisations! One never hears them now. And his great Creed in E! Who can really render it? I don't know; and I have heard it in St. Paul's. It was very fine—but it wasn't Wesley!

DR. WESLEY ON "METRONOMIC MARKS."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I have read with much interest Mr. Pyne's recollections of Dr. S. S. Wesley in the current number of The Musical Times, and they bring to my mind an incident connected with him and the Bristol Madrigal Society.

We performed Wesley's chorus "The Praise of Music" at our "Ladies' Night," January 22, 1874. At the final rehearsal, on the previous evening, Dr. Wesley was present. After we had tried through his chorus, I asked him if the rendering satisfied him. "Yes! all but the tempo," he replied; "I want it faster!" "Gentlemen," said I, "the Doctor wants it faster than his own metronomic mark" (♩= 76). At this there was a laugh. He then gave me the speed at which he desired it should go, and we did it to his satisfaction.

The next day I was at the Victoria Rooms seeing to the placing of the books on the orchestra, when in came Dr. Wesley, who called out to me, "You were right. I did want it faster than my own metronomic marks. Let me come with you to your house, and we will try it with your metronome, mine is out of order." Away we went to my home. When Wesley had seated himself at my pedal pianoforte (the pedals of which he used most effectively), he played his magnificent composition through, saying, as he began, "Will you set the metronome when I have got into the swing of it?" This I did, and at the close we found that the first movement should have been marked ♩= 104, instead of 76; and the second movement, "When man seeks relief," ♪= 144, instead of 132. I asked him to put the alterations down on paper and sign them. He readily complied, adding: "I think it would be wiser if composers generally got a friend to set the metronome while they themselves played, it would then be a fairer indication of a whole movement."

When he was playing the second movement he turned to me and said with great naïveté: "Very pretty, isn't it?" "Very," I replied, and I meant it too. As he was leaving the house I went with him to the front door and told him the number of steps. As I spoke he jumped, and turning round to me said: "I generally jump when I don't know how far I have to go." "Rather risky," I said. "Well, I am all right now, any way," replied Wesley, as he walked away.

A copy of the ballad "She wore a wreath of roses," by J. P. Knight, happened to be on the pianoforte at the time of Wesley's visit. He took it up and said: "I am very fond of this. If you like, I will harmonize it for your Society." I thanked him. It was, however, thought that the proposed "arrangement" would hardly be in keeping with the traditions of the Society, and so it fell through.

I am, Sir, yours faithfully,
Daniel Wilberforce Rootham,
Conductor of the Bristol Madrigal Society.
6, Ashgrove Road, Redland, Bristol,
June 6, 1899.

[The metronomic marks have not been altered in the current edition of "The Praise of Music"!—Ed., M.T.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Ashburton.—The Moreton and Totnes Deaneries Association held a successful festival, on the 15th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. W. J. Bown, of Newton. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Dr. Ferris Tozer, of Exeter, and the anthem, "Sing a song of praise," by Sir John Stainer. Mr. H. O. Jones, organist of the Parish Church, gave an organ recital, the organ being supplemented by trumpet and trombones, the former instrument being played by Mr. W. H. Whiddon.

Basingstoke.—Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was performed before a crowded congregation in St. Mary's Church, at a special evening service, on the 8th ult. The solo vocalists were Miss Alice Simons, Miss Edith Nutter, Mr. W. Blandford, and Mr. Foxton Ferguson. Mr. Charles Griffiths led the orchestra, Mr. Ernest Read played the organ, and Mr. H. E. Powell conducted.

Brighton.—A very successful concert was given on the 14th ult., by the Brighton School of Music, at the Athenæum Hall. The principal features were Grieg's Symphonic Danse (which was admirably rendered by the orchestra), Haydn's Symphony (No. 5), and Schubert's Overture in D. Dr. A. King and Mr. Robert Taylor shared the duties of conductor and performed their task with great satisfaction.

Chelmsford.—The Chelmsford Association of Church Choirs held its annual festival service at the Parish Church, on Tuesday, the 13th ult., the voices numbering 350. The anthem, "Now are we ambassadors" and "How lovely are the messengers," from "St. Paul," was excellently sung; as was indeed the whole of the service. Mr. F. R. Frye (choirmaster to the Association) conducted, and Dr. G. F. Huntley, of St. Peter's, Eaton Square, was the organist.

Dorman's Land (East Grinstead).—The Dorman's Land Choral Society achieved an unqualified success with its afternoon concert, in the Lecture Hall, on the 24th ult. The principal feature was Spohr's "Last Judgment," the solos being taken by Miss Mildred Harwood, Mr. H. B. Harwood, and Mr. Graham Smart. A small but efficient orchestra was led by Mr. Lardner, while Miss Mabel Laker presided at the pianoforte. The whole reflected great credit upon Mr. Shepherd, the able conductor, and all concerned.

Guildford.—A series of interesting chamber concerts, under the direction of Messrs. Storrie and Shaw, was brought to a close, on the 9th ult., with a very successful concert in the County and Borough Hall. The works performed were: Brahms's First Pianoforte Quartet in G minor (Op. 25), Mozart's String Quintet in G minor, and Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata. The performers were Mrs. Shaw, pianoforte; Mr. Edward O'Brien, first violin; Mr. W. Woods, second violin; Miss Olive Auckland, first viola; Mr. Shaw, second viola; and Mr. R. Storrie, violoncello.

Hove.—On the 15th ult. the choir of St. Barnabas Church gave a very creditable rendering of Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The orchestra was led by Miss Kettle, and Mr. Alfred Abdey performed the duties of organist, while Mr. East, organist of the church, conducted. The soloists were Miss J. Fraser, Mr. George Long, and the Rev. K. Macdermott, all of whom acquitted themselves with great credit.

Pietermaritzburg.—A very successful concert was given by the Orchestral and Choral Society in the Theatre, on May 13, under the efficient conductorship of Mr. Campbell Rowland. The programme included the following works: Mendelssohn's "Trumpet" Overture and the Allegro from his "Italian" Symphony; Sir Frederick Bridge's "The Inchcape Rock"; Mozart's Overture to "Zauberflöte"; and a selection from Gounod's "Romeo and Juliet."

Portsea.—The annual festival under the auspices of the Winchester Diocesan Choral Association was held by the Portsmouth and East Hants Choral Union, in the Portsea Parish Church, on the 7th ult. The amalgamated choirs numbered 250 voices and the orchestra consisted of twenty-two string instruments. Mr. Löhr, organist of St. Jude's, presided at the organ, and Mr. J. W. D. Pillow conducted. The music included Stanford's Te Deum in E flat, Parry's Magnificat in D, and Sullivan's "I will sing of Thy power." The festival, at which the Dean of Winchester preached the sermon, was a great success.

Wells (Somerset).—A successful performance of Parry's "Judith" was given in the Town Hall on May 26. Considering the difficulties in the way of attempting such a large work with small resources, great credit is due to the Wells Musical Association for its achievement. The orchestra was supplemented by professionals, and the soloists, especially Miss Mabel Bond, of the Royal College of Music, were excellent. Dr. Percy Buck, who has now taken up his work as organist of Bristol Cathedral, conducted. Under his baton the Society has, in three years, performed Parry's "St. Cecilia's Day" and "Blest Pair of Sirens" (twice), the "St. Matthew" Passion (three times), Brahms's "Requiem," Stanford's "Phaudrig Crohoore," and many symphonies, &c., of the highest rank.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. Mowbray P. Balme, to the Parish Church, Kippington, Sevenoaks.—Mr. Emmanuel Barson, Organist and Choirmaster to Chelsea Congregational Church, Markham Square.—Mr. H. Crackel, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Masbro, Rotherham.—Mr. William Darley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Jude's Church, Whitechapel.—Mr. A. Jones Roberts, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Lawrence, Whitchurch.—Mr. J. R. Dear, to St. Saviour's Church, Eastbourne.—Mr. Frank Dibb, to St. Paul's Church, Birkenhead.—Mr. Wesley Hammet, to Clapham Wesleyan Church.—Mr. A. F. Wareham, to Woolton Parish Church.—Mr. J. J. Bushill, to Dunbeth United Presbyterian Church, Coatbridge.—Mr. Wilfred G. A. Shebbeare, to the Church of the Cowley Fathers, Cowley St. John, Oxford.

Choir Appointment.—Mr. Alexander Richards, Solo Bass, to St. Mark's, Hamilton Terrace.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

N. S. K. (Blue Mountains, New South Wales).—(1.) The Gewandhaus concerts are so called from their being held in the Hall of the Gewandhaus, the ancient armoury of the city of Leipzig. The first performances were held in a private house in 1743, during the time that J. S. Bach was Cantor of the Thomasschule. In 1781 the concerts were located in the Gewandhaus. A magnificent new building—the "Neues Gewandhaus"—was inaugurated December 11-13, 1884. (2.) Mendelssohn wrote his "Reformation Symphony" in connection with the tercentenary festival of the Augsburg Protestant Confession, 1830. No performance, however, took place at that time. Says Sir George Grove: "The revolutionary troubles had broken out in Germany, conflicts had taken place between Protestants and Catholics, and Mendelssohn preferred to postpone his work till its success should be endangered by no polemical or political differences." (3.) We hope to give a clue to Mendelssohn's "A Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture in our next issue; it is crowded out for want of space. (4.) We cannot say. (5.) We cannot exactly divine the book you are seeking; but that by Dr. Bie, reviewed in our present issue, is on the lines you mention.

R. A. M.—The following are suggested metronomic rates for the eight Preludes and Fugues by Bach for the Organ in Vol. 1 of the Bridge and Higgs edition of those works:—
No. 1. Prelude and Fugue ♩ = 76. No. 2. Prelude and Fugue ♩ = 80. No. 3. Prelude ♩ = 66; Fugue ♩ = 116. No. 4. Prelude ♪ = 116; Fugue ♩ = 96. No. 5. Prelude, Grave ♩ = 56, Allegro ♩ = 84; Fugue ♩ = 100. No. 6. Prelude 𝅗𝅥 = 72; Fugue ♩ = 92. No. 7. Prelude ♩ = 60; Fugue ♩. = 76. No. 8. Prelude ♩ = 92; Fugue ♩ = 96.

N. W.—Yes, Spohr composed a pianoforte sonata, which he dedicated to Mendelssohn. It is in the key of A flat (Op. 125) and is published by Messrs. Ashdown. The work seems to have been only once played at the Monday Popular Concerts—viz., on November 28, 1859, when all the instrumental portion of the programme was selected from the works of Spohr, to commemorate his death, which took place on October 22 of that year. The performer on that occasion was the late Lindsay Sloper.

W. H. W.—You have probably strained or forced your voice. If you cannot get any lessons from a good teacher, try practising long sustained notes on oo-oh-ah —beginning with the closed vowel and gradually opening the mouth till the ah is obtained. Take a deep inspiration, and sing softly and naturally. Quality before quantity, and you will probably not "crack" if you keep within the true compass of your voice.

A. R. C. O.—You will find a balanced swell pedal in Walker's organ in St. Jude's Church, Turk's Row, Lower Sloane Street. The organist, Mr. J. V. Marsh, 48, Chelsea Gardens, will doubtless offer you facilities for examining it upon application to him.

Stretto.—We do not know of any prizes exactly on the lines you mention. The Madrigal Society's prizes are for composition only. Particulars may be obtained of the Hon. Sec., Mr. J. E. Street, Woodside, Caterham.

L. R. A. M.—*Bach's Prelude and Fugue in F minor (Book II. of the "48") may be played at about* ♩ = 72 for the Prelude, and ♩ = 88 for the Fugue; and Chopin's Nocturne in G major (Op. 37) at ♩. = 56.

R. W. F.—There is no reason why you should not begin to learn the organ. But as to your entering the musical profession—don't.

Diapason.—Thanks for your suggestion, which shall have our best attention.

One or two questions are unavoidably held over by reason of space.

NOVELLO'S
VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. II.
CONTAINING
50 DOUBLE CHANTS.

Price Sixpence.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. II., Chant No. 23, by Lord Mornington, which is included on account of its great popularity.

"Mr. Mallinson, whom we have often had occasion to mention as a clever and characteristic composer, gave, last night, an interesting résume of his romance productions, which comprised such spontaneously charming songs as 'Eleänore,' 'Snowflakes,' 'Slow, horses, slow,' 'Violet,' 'Eldorado,' and 'Bed in Summer'; such fresh and glad songs as 'Canadian Hunter's Song' and 'Sing, break into song'; a Wagner-like 'Slumber Song,' and more philosophic and peculiarly abstract songs like 'Intra Muros,' 'Evening,' and 'Appleblossom.' He is evidently an extremely sensitive, intelligent, and even fastidious composer, who often obtains the greatest effects by the smallest means. . . . It is a pleasure to make the acquaintance of that kind of musician, who, like Mr. Mallinson, has something of his own to say, and can say it without throwing away all that is called form and inherited ideas of beauty."—National Tidende, Copenhagen.

"He weaves his melodies into the daintiest and most characteristic accompaniments, which often reproduce the mood in the finest sense."—Vort Land, Copenhagen.

"In the English language the lady sang three songs by her husband, which one can, without reserve, place among the best of their kind."—Dresdner Zeitung.

"Effective songs, in the invention of which everything ignoble is avoided."—Leipziger Zeitung.

"Mr. Mallinson, besides, introduced himself as a composer of songs, which have to be classed amongst the best of the productions of modern Lieder-literature."—English and American Register, Berlin.

PREFACE.

The words of these Four-and-Twenty little Songs have been selected from Mr. Norman Gale's delightful volume of Children's Poems. A few modifications of the original text have been made in order to facilitate their musical rendering.

Though in the first instance, no doubt, the songs will be mainly sung to children rather than by them, the Composer's aim has been to observe such conditions in his settings as to make it easy for children to join in singing them themselves. With this object he has endeavoured to furnish simple, rhythmical melodies of a suitable compass, and it will be found that in the case of sixteen out of the twenty-four songs the vocal range is confined to the octave, whilst in only three instances does it exceed nine notes.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence each.

E. Teschemacher, 11, Redington Road, Hampstead.

This Choral Society has been formed under the above title for the purpose of holding, during the winter months, Concerts in the North-West District of London.

The aim of the new Society is to produce Choral and Instrumental Works of the highest class, both British and Foreign, which are not so frequently heard in London. A Chorus of from 150 to 200 will be required, and it is believed that this number can be easily found in the district.

Choral Practices will be held weekly at the Hall of the London Society for the Teaching of the Blind, Swiss Cottage, or at some other suitable place, commencing at the end of September and ending about the end of March, with a short interval at Christmas. It is proposed, if possible, to hold Two Choral Concerts and One Chamber Concert.

A full Professional Orchestra of about 40 will be engaged for the Choral Concerts, and it is hoped, by including in the programmes Works of importance which are comparatively seldom heard in London, that a special interest in this Society will be awakened in all lovers of music.

The proposed programme for the first concert, to be held about the end of November, will consist of Cowen's "Sleeping Beauty," Goetz's Symphony in F ("Spring"), and Mendelssohn's Psalm "When Israel out of Egypt came." For the second choral concert it is proposed to select Beethoven's Mass in C or Parry's "St. Cecilia's Day" and Bach's Cantata "Sleepers, wake."

For the Chamber Concert a first-class String Quartet will be engaged, and as the expense of these three concerts will be considerable, it is hoped that a large amount of support will be forthcoming.

Will those who feel disposed to join this Society as Honorary or Choral Members kindly sign their name and write their address and forward them at once, stating whether their voice is a Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, or Bass; also whether they have sung in a Choral Society before, either to Mr. J. D. Perrott, 59, Queen's Road, N.W., or to Mr. W. H. Speer, Powyslea, St. Albans.

The subscription for all Members has been fixed at 10s. 6d.

A General Meeting will be held in due course, notice of which will be given by post when sufficient replies have been received to this circular, and a sufficient number of names are forthcoming.

Latest Press Notices.

"The beautiful voice of Mr. James McInnes was displayed to the greatest possible advantage in Brahms's 'Wie bist du meine Königin' and 'Wir wandelten,' both of which suit him to perfection."—The Times.

"Mr. James McInnes employed his fine baritone voice, sympathetic in quality, in expressive renderings of Brahms's 'Wie bist du meine Königin' and 'Wir wandelten.' He also sang two effective vocal pieces by Sir Hubert Parry, and added Lully's 'Bois Epais' in response to the demand for something more."—Daily Telegraph.

"Mr. James McInnes, a baritone of rare promise, sang a couple of songs by Brahms in first-rate style."—Daily Graphic.

"Mr. James McInnes, who appeared for the first time in Manchester, sang the 'Erl-King' with a baritone voice of remarkably fine timbre and with excellent enunciation. . . . The singer achieved an unquestionable success. He was afterwards heard in a duet which was admirably sung with orchestral accompaniment."—Manchester Guardian.

"Mr. James McInnes, the baritone, carried off premier honours, and paved the way, we hope, for many subsequent engagements. He it was who first quickened the pulse of the performance by his impassioned delivery of the altercation with Samson, which reached a sublime climax in 'Honour and Arms.' At a later stage his conception of the part of Manoah was a triumph, and we never before heard so much pathos put into a male voice."—Blackpool Times.

MR. ARTHUR BARLOW
(BASS)
For Oratorio, Opera, and Concerts.

"Samson" (Handel).—"Mr. Arthur Barlow, who is steadily working his way to the front as an oratorio singer, threw plenty of vigour into his rendering of 'Honour and Arms,' and made his mark also in Manoah's air 'How willing my paternal love,' which he interpreted with notable feeling and expression."—London Daily Telegraph, September 19, 1898.

". . . . But the great triumph of the concert was achieved by Mr. Arthur Barlow, whose voice and method are beyond praise. After 'Honour and Arms' he received a genuine ovation."—Yorkshire Post, April 19, 1899.

"Lohengrin" at Hallé Concert, Manchester.—"Mr. Arthur Barlow sang the part of Henry the Fowler with great distinction and success."—Evening News, December 2, 1898.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

AUGUST 1, 1899.

BEN DAVIES.

"MÔR o gân yw Cymru gŷd," which, being interpreted, means "Wales is a sea of song." Not only is this saying a truism, but from out this sea excellent fish may be caught. The observant sympathetic visitor to Eisteddfodau cannot fail to have been greatly struck by the inherent love of vocal music deep-rooted in the hearts of the Welsh people. He will find it asserting itself quite naturally everywhere in the Principality. In the quarries, for instance, where, while taking shelter in the huts during blasting operations, the miners will spontaneously burst into song—not a repulsive, vulgar unisonal ditty, but in blended strains of pure vocal harmony. Likewise in the chapels, where the religious fervour of those great congregations finds its deepest expression in overwhelming outpourings of psalms and hymns and spiritual songs. The naturalness, the spontaneity, and, above all, the earnestness of these vocal utterances of the people deeply impress the listener. The emotions that are stirred by such experiences cannot be described, they can only be felt; but, happily, they can be treasured up in the memory and recalled with a pleasure that is as genuine as it is delightful. It was in such an environment that the distinguished tenor, Ben Davies, was bred and born. The story of his career, as he modestly relates the ups and downs of his life, is as eventful as it is interesting.

Benjamin Grey Davies was born January 6 ("The Epiphany"), 1858. The place of his birth was Pontardawe, a populous village about eight miles from Swansea, situate in the same valley as Craig y Nos castle, the residence of Madame Adelina Patti. The father of Ben was an engineer. Like many of his countrymen he was an excellent local preacher, and his services were in great demand for supplying the various pulpits round about Swansea. But when his eldest son, Ben, was only seven years old the breadwinner of the family was prematurely called away by the angel of death, leaving behind him a widow and four young children, the youngest only three weeks old. It was a terrible blow, and a less courageous woman than his true-hearted widow would have been crushed in spirit. Financially Mrs. Davies had nothing; but rich in a fervent belief of a kind and never-failing Providence, she bravely fought the battle of life for the sake of her children with a heroic devotion meriting the highest praise. She doubtless recalls the struggles of those dark days when she worked so hard to provide for the wants of her quartet of little ones—a daughter and three sons, one of whom is now a schoolmaster and another an accountant. And to-day, in the fame of her boy Ben and the positions in life of her other two sons, Mrs. Davies, from the quietude of her Welsh home, must surely perceive the silver lining to the dark cloud of her early widowhood. "Her children rise up and call her blessed."

A SINGER AT FIVE.

Ben began to sing when he was about five years old. At the age of six he was a member of a choir that competed for a prize at an Eisteddfod at Carmarthen. He started on tonic sol-fa, and to-day he pays a high tribute to the system, with its mental effects and its invaluable aid as a means of producing good readers of the staff notation. He thinks out all his intervals and modulations in sol-fa. The interval of a major seventh, or even an augmented fourth, for instance, does not present the least difficulty to him: he merely thinks of the one as doh to te, and the other as fah to te, and sings them quite easily and perfectly in tune.

At an early age he joined the choir of the Congregational chapel at Cwmbwrla as a boy alto; he never sang soprano. There was no organ in the chapel, therefore all the music, which included an anthem now and then, was purely vocal and, it need scarcely be stated, distinctly congregational. Later on he conducted a tonic sol-fa class at the chapel. But there was not the least idea that he would become a public singer. In fact, not only his mother, but the good people of the chapel thought that he must have inherited the preaching gifts of his father; that he should go to college, and, in due time, blossom forth as "The Reverend Benjamin Davies, D.D." He says: "To this day my mother is disappointed that I did not become a preacher. I sometimes extemporise a sermon to show her that I should have proved a failure in that capacity; and then friends console her with the remark that I often preach a sermon when I sing such strains as 'If with all your hearts' and 'Be thou faithful unto death.'" Who will doubt the truth of this? As a clergyman wrote in one of the London papers: "Was there, for instance, a lovelier sermon preached in London that [Christmas] day than the opening recitative and air 'Comfort ye,' sung—I had almost written spoken—gloriously by Mr. Ben Davies, and what is true singing but elevated poetic speech?" These words should be pondered by all aspiring young vocalists; yea, and even by those of older growth: it is never too late to mend.

A LOST VOICE.

But to return to the Welsh boy at Swansea. “Ever since I was twelve years old I have earned my own living,” says Mr. Davies. “I held a situation in a store in Swansea for some years—until I was twenty, in fact. In the year 1873 I paid my first visit to London as a member of the South Wales choir, formed and conducted by Caradog, which competed at the National Musical Meetings held at the Crystal Palace. The other day, when I sang the tenor solos in ‘Elijah’ there, I could not help recalling my first appearance on the Handel orchestra twenty-six years ago as a boy of fifteen, when I was one of the altos in Caradog’s choir. We stayed a week in London. My mother, however, did not care about my undertaking the journey without her. Each member of the choir received five guineas and a medal—the former, to defray expenses, was raised by public rehearsals of the pieces in Swansea, at which a charge for admission was made.” Those who were present at that competition will remember the extraordinary vigour with which those Welsh people sang “Come with torches” (from Mendelssohn’s “Walpurgis Night”)—in fact, they (the singers) were literally ablaze with enthusiasm. One result of this, his first visit to London, was that Ben Davies lost his voice—in other words, it suddenly “broke” before he returned home. “Don’t sing for years,” was the advice earnestly given to him by a friend, which he very wisely followed. For the next five years he worked steadily on as a salesman at the store, and, to his credit be it said, he is not ashamed to own it in these days of prosperity.

HIS FIRST SUCCESS.

When he was nineteen he suddenly discovered that he had a tenor voice. A friend advised him to compete at an Eisteddfod held at Swansea, on Good Friday, 1877. “It’s no use for me to try, it’s absurd to think of it,” replied Ben. However, he ultimately changed his mind and sang before an audience of 5,000 people, who were unstinting in their applause. The test piece was “Love in her eyes sits playing.” “There were fifteen of us,” he says, “I never dreamt that I should get the prize. In fact, I was walking away, when someone told me that I had to sing again, and the result was that I came out first. The prize was half-a-guinea, which amount was placed in a bag and, when I marched up to receive the award, hung round my neck. One of the adjudicators was the late W. A. Howells, who was kind enough to predict that some day I should become a great singer. Shortly afterwards Brinley Richards visited Swansea and I was advised to sing to him. He very kindly listened to me and thereupon urged me to come to London and study at the Royal Academy of Music. I took some time to consider a proposal involving such an important change in my life. My mother was against it: she still thought that I ought to be a preacher! But at last I decided to take the plunge. I had saved enough money to pay my Academy fees for six months, and by means of a few engagements, with some help from my mother, I managed to live for a year in London, during which time I boarded with an aunt at Kilburn. I had an uncle who, from beginning life in very humble circumstances, became an inspector of mines at £1,000 a year. He very generously offered to keep me during my next year at the Academy. But before I returned to London for my second Academy year my uncle died. All my money was gone, and I thought that I should have to go back to the store. Friends were very kind to me. They not only urged me to continue my studies, but organised a concert for me which realised a profit of £50 to £60. But I gave it all to my mother, and determined to pay my own way by the proceeds of engagements, which I did, and I was able to meet all the payments for my fees as they became due.”

AN ACADEMY STUDENT.

Mr. Davies remained at the Academy for three years—1878-79-80. At the end of his first year he took a bronze medal, and a year later a silver medal. He subsequently took the Evill prize “for Declamatory English singing” in 1880, and the Parepa-Rosa gold medal in 1881. He is now a Fellow of the Institution. His singing professor at the Academy was Signor Fiori. But Mr. Randegger took a great interest in the young Welshman. “He was my father and friend,” he says, “and gave me many valuable lessons for which he never charged a farthing. Often after a hard day’s work he would take me through a whole work, coaching me thoroughly in it and giving me hints of the greatest possible value. He also obtained for me many engagements—he was more than kind. Later on Barnby gave me some private coaching, for which he too would not accept any remuneration. My tonic sol-fa training was of great assistance to me at the Academy, especially in the music-dictation class. The director, Mr. Eyers, used to play little airs on the pianoforte. I used to take them down in sol-fa and, after translating them into the staff notation, would be the first to hand in the result. Mr. Eyers was surprised and wondered how it was that I did them so quickly.”

NOT THE GERMAN BAND MAN!

His first oratorio engagement came about in a curious, though very gratifying way. On December 20, 1879, he, as a student, sang the tenor solos in the “Hymn of Praise” at an Academy concert given in St. James’s Hall. The sightless Principal said to him after the performance: “Davies, I could listen to your singing of that beautiful music all night.” Seated next to Sir George Macfarren on that occasion was a very distinguished singer, whom, for the time being, we will call "Q." On the morning of the concert "Q." had received a letter from "Joe" Robinson, of Dublin, asking him if he could recommend a tenor to sing the solos in "St. Paul." That same evening "Q." wrote to Robinson strongly recommending Davies, who had so greatly pleased him at the Academy concert. The Dublin conductor thereupon asked Davies if he would be willing to sing for "twenty guineas." "I should think I would," said Ben to himself; "aye! even ten"!

Upon his arrival in Dublin, Ben made his way to Robinson's house. As he stood on the doorstep a German band—Robinson's agony-mongers—were in the midst of their blasting operations. The door was partly opened by Robinson himself, who, to Davies's astonishment, nasally and furiously ejaculated: "Go away, go away." "Old Joe," poor man, thought that the Welsh tenor was the German band man who had come round for the money! He was highly amused at his precipitancy, so much so that when (at the rehearsal) the band applauded the young Academy student, Robinson spoke of him as "the German bandmaster who had come round for the money"! He then related the doorstep incident, greatly to the amusement of the orchestra. Robinson, who was much pleased with Davies's singing, said to him afterwards: "I suppose you don't know to whom you are indebted for this engagement.—You were recommended to me by Mr. Santley."

WITH CARL ROSA.

Opera, not oratorio, was to claim the attention and energies of Ben Davies for the next few years. At one of the Academy opera performances—it was the garden scene from "Faust"—Carl Rosa was present. Shortly afterwards he asked Davies if he would like to go on the stage. The offer of a salary of £10 a week for the first year, £15 for the second, and £20 for the third, with the option of breaking the contract at the end of each successive year, was a very tempting one to a young beginner, and it was accepted. He had no difficulty in learning the necessary stage business, as he possessed a natural aptitude for acting. He would frequently act alone (in one of the Academy class rooms) before old Walter Lacy, who gave him much encouragement and not a little practical help. Carl Rosa, with the astuteness of an "old hand," suggested that Davies should not try his 'prentice hand in opera before a London audience, but that he should first appear in the provinces. Bristol was the place of his operatic début, which took place at the New Theatre Royal, on October 11, 1881. The opera was Balfe's "Bohemian Girl." Davies was very nervous. At the end of the first act Rosa said nothing; "Better," was his monosyllabic criticism after the second; "That will do" after the third, when the audience had signified their approval of the new tenor, to whom Balfe's "old girl" proved to be a very good friend. A criticism of this first appearance may be quoted:—

> The distinguishing feature of the evening was the first appearance on any stage of Mr. Ben Davies, who filled the rôle of Thaddeus. To essay a character of such a class, in connexion with a company boasting a high reputation, and upon a stage so large, and in a house so capacious, must have been, it will be admitted, a severe undertaking, and we feel sure that all who heard the new tenor, and now learn the fact we have stated, will join with us in congratulating him not only upon his present success, but upon the promise he gave of assuming at some future day a very high position in his art.—Bristol Mercury, October 12, 1881.

The first appearance of Ben Davies at a London theatre was in the same opera, at Her Majesty's Theatre, January 25, 1882. The Musical Times, in noticing the performance, said:—

> A repetition of the "Bohemian Girl" introduced Mr. B. Davies in the part of Thaddeus. He has an excellent voice and was warmly and most deservedly applauded in his principal songs. His method of vocalisation is extremely good, and he displays an aptitude which warrants us in believing that he will be a valuable acquisition to the company.

Ben Davies sang at the productions of the following operas during his connection with the Carl Rosa Company:—

"Esmeralda" (Goring Thomas) .	March 26, 1883.
"Colomba" (Sir A. C. Mackenzie) .	April 9, 1883.
"The Canterbury Pilgrims" (Professor Stanford) .	April 28, 1884.

In connection with the preparations for producing "Colomba," an interesting incident may be recorded. Davies, who took the part of the Sergeant of Marines, had only about twenty bars to sing at the beginning of the opera. At a rehearsal, after he had sung his part, he asked leave of the composer to depart. Sir Alexander (then Dr.) Mackenzie said "yes," and then, turning to a lady sitting beside him, he said: "There goes the best artist of the company, and I have given him nothing to do." Such an unsolicited appreciation could not have fallen upon more sympathetic ears, as, unknown to Sir Alexander, the lady to whom he addressed this highly complimentary remark was Miss Clara Perry, a prima donna of the company, to whom the Sergeant of Marines was then engaged (or nearly so), and who became Mrs. Ben Davies in 1885.

It has been said that Carl Rosa was a hard man financially, but the following letter may help to remove that impression:—

> Dear Mr. Davies,
> I enclose you cheque for ten pounds as a mark of appreciation for hard work done last week in case of emergency.
>
> Faithfully yours,
> Dec. 8, 1884. Carl Rosa.

Mr. and Mrs. Davies both left the Carl Rosa Company upon their marriage. In the autumn of 1886 they were taking a long holiday. The popular tenor had lent his savings to a friend, on the condition that a portion of the amount could be called in at any time. Whilst staying at Margate Ben Davies discovered that his balance at the bank had run down to £10! He thereupon wrote to the "friend" asking for part repayment of the loan. In the meantime he had refused an offer made by Mr. J. W. Turner to join his company. The morning after the Turner letter had been posted, he learned from his "friend" that the firm with whom he was connected had become bankrupt! Davies immediately telegraphed to Turner: "Letter of refusal withdrawn. I accept." Thus for the next few months, until the end of 1886, he was the leading tenor in J. W. Turner's Opera Company.

"DOROTHY."

Although he preferred the concert platform to the stage, concert engagements did not come in so quickly as he would have liked. The London managers would not have anything to say to him. At that time (the beginning of 1887) Arthur Cellier's famous opera "Dorothy" was little more than dragging out its existence at the Prince of Wales's Theatre. New blood was wanted to galvanise it into life, and this Ben Davies immediately supplied. "The management strongly urged me to join the company," he says. "I refused twice, although I was offered £40 a week for a six weeks' engagement. At last I consented, and sang in the opera for the first time on February 19, 1887. At the end of the first week I received a very gratifying letter from Mr. Stephenson, the librettist. Here it is:—

> My dear Mr. Davies,
> Having waited till the rush of congratulations had passed, I waited too long and turned up after you had gone. And, as I am leaving town to-morrow, I shall not have an opportunity till the end of the week of expressing to you my most grateful sense of my obligation to you for your performance of Wilder. Your experience has put the character where it was intended to be, and I consider myself most fortunate to have had the work interpreted by so rare a treasure as a tenor who can act.
> With many thanks,
> Believe me,
> Yours very truly,
> B. Charles Stephenson.

"My six weeks' engagement was renewed over and over again, and I ultimately sang the part of Geoffrey Wilder for more than two years—over 800 nights. I received the same rate of payment throughout the run of the piece—£40 a week. I began to feel somewhat like a machine, but there was a certain fascination in facing a fresh audience every night. I soon, however, began to recognise the same faces, somewhat upon the 'here we are again' system. One old gentleman, his wife and daughter came regularly once every week and occupied the same seats. I used to give them a little friendly nod. Once when I was returning home in the twopenny omnibus an old lady sitting next to me said: 'May I speak to you, Mr. Davies?' 'Certainly, Madam,' I replied. 'May I shake hands with you, Mr. Davies?' I responded 'Yes, you may.' Then she went on to say that she had heard me sing in 'Dorothy' ninety times. 'I hope to go ninety times more,' she added. 'I've kept all the counterfoils of the tickets, and I've paid every time!' I never met the old lady again and I have not the least idea who she was or where she came from. Yes, I had some very amusing experiences. I received no end of letters from all sorts of people in reference to my singing, acting, &c.—aye, and even in regard to my stage habiliments. Here is one that I kept. It is anonymous and is surmounted with a coronet:—

> We were more than delighted with the delightful songs you sang last night, rendered with so much sympathy and pathos, and your acting, as ever, full of manly vigour.
> Your two first costumes were most becoming, but the last—may a woman and an admirer suggest?—is not in your usual taste. The pink coat is perfect, but the cardinal is too vivid and spoils the effect of what otherwise is faultless. The writer hopes soon to revisit the theatre. May her wish be gratified to see you in pink or white satin?

This referred to my dress in the 'Red Hussar,' which was at first of a temporary nature, as the proper garb could not be prepared in time. Strangely enough, white satin had already been chosen; therefore my fair counsellor doubtless had the satisfaction of thinking that her suggestion had been adopted."

FAREWELL TO OPERA.

After "Dorothy" Mr. Davies turned his energies almost entirely in the direction of concert and oratorio singing. There was, however, one exception, and that was when he sustained the title-rôle of Sir Arthur Sullivan's opera "Ivanhoe," which was produced on January 31, 1891. In this connection the following extract from a letter written by the composer eight months before the event deserves to be quoted:—

> 1, Queen's Mansions,
> Victoria Street, S.W.
> 9.5 90.
> Dear Mr. Davies,
> Mr. Carte has I believe asked you to see him to-morrow morning about my new opera.
>
> You of course know that it is my desire to secure your co-operation and that I am most anxious to come to an arrangement, for I have followed you with interest from the beginning of your career, and have been delighted to see how my predictions have been fulfilled.
> . . . .
> Yours sincerely,
> Arthur Sullivan.

A few appearances at the Royal Italian Opera have also to be recorded; and had Mr. Davies been so minded he would doubtless have been heard more frequently at Covent Garden. The following letter to him, from the late Sir Augustus Harris, dated December 17, 1895, lends support to that surmise:—

> My dear Ben Davies,
> I note you cannot sing "Siegmund." Why not reconsider your decision? There are only two acts. You know the first in English and I feel sure you would find it a fine triumph for Germany. I know what a success you would make and what a permanent source of revenue it would be for you, and that is why I persist. I am sure it would be a work of love. Let me know.

Yours truly,
A. Harris.

There is no need to continue a detailed record of Mr. Davies's career during the last few years. The success that he has most deservedly attained is too well known to be enlarged upon here. Suffice it to place on record that he appears at all the principal concerts and festivals as a tenor of the first rank. His first Festival was that of Norwich in 1890; he has sung at the subsequent meetings of 1893 and 1896, and is engaged for the approaching Festival in October; Bristol, 1893 and 1896; Gloucester, 1895 and 1898; and Leeds, 1895 and 1898.

AMERICA.

Mr. Davies first crossed the Atlantic in 1893. He had been engaged to sing in a series of concerts at the World's Fair, Chicago, at a fee of £600. Passages for himself and his wife had been taken, and they eagerly looked forward to the trip. On the night before their departure he received a cablegram cancelling the engagement! "Never mind, let's go," urged Mrs. Davies; "something may come of it." He thereupon cabled: "Too late: am sailing to-morrow." Upon their arrival at Chicago, the Welsh people and the World's Fair jointly arranged to give seven concerts. Nothing was said to Davies about terms, however. Every concert proved to be a great success and they were attended by crowded audiences. At the end of the series—which lasted ten days—the manager called the Welsh tenor into his office, when he handed him a pile (about a foot high!) of dollar bills, to the value of the original sum—namely, £600. Thus something did come of it, as Mrs. Davies prophesied. Moreover, her husband has visited America every year since, making seven crossings in all, and singing at three Cincinnati Festivals. He likes America and the American people very much. The American journals afford him some amusement. One morning he saw displayed in large type on a newspaper contents-bill:

IS DAVIES EQUAL TO LLOYD?
A MATTER OF TASTE.

One of the critics stated that he had "a fine voice and small feet." Once when crossing the Atlantic he sang at an impromptu concert given in the saloon of the liner for a charity. The next morning a typical American accosted him on deck with the encouraging observation: "You have a fine voice. I guess you'd make a very good professional." In 1894 he paid his first professional visit to Germany—a visit which has since become annual. At his first appearance in the Fatherland he was coldly received; but his rendering of the "Jephtha" recitative and air thawed the frigid Berlin audience into warmly appreciative applause. One of the critics went so far as to say that the English tenor had restored a lost art to Germany—the art of the bel canto.

THE QUEEN.

Mr. Ben Davies has frequently sung before the Queen. On the first occasion (in 1892) that he obeyed the royal command, Her Majesty said to him: "You come from Wales, where there are some beautiful voices. I have much enjoyed your singing, and I hope that I shall hear you again." This hope has been fully realised, as either at Windsor, Osborne, or Balmoral he has sung before the Queen on nine different occasions, the last being as recent as the 15th ult. The Queen, who is an exceedingly appreciative listener to music, always requests that "Salve! dimora," from Gounod's "Faust," shall be included in Mr. Davies's selection. Amongst the presents that he has received from the Queen are a gold watch, a silver inkstand, a beautiful silver cigar box with very fine chasing, a set of diamond links, a pearl and diamond pin, and a signed portrait of Her Majesty. It may thus then be assumed that the Welsh tenor is a great favourite in the Royal circle.

PERSONALIA.

If one were asked to describe in a single word the personality of Ben Davies it would be—geniality. He is one of the most warm-hearted and kindly disposed of men. Perfectly free from affectation, his natural bonhomie is a delightful and attractive feature of his good-natured self. His unprofessionalism—if the word may be allowed—was amusingly commented upon in a remark made by a concert agent from Germany. This gentleman called upon him just as he had dismounted from his steed after a morning's ride. Seeing him in equestrian garb the German said: "I expected to see an artist, but—I see a gentleman!" In his pleasant home in the delightful suburb of Hampstead, surrounded by all that makes life worth living, Ben Davies is as happy as the day is long. He has always lived a simple life, has taken care of his constitution, and, moreover, he has never squandered his earnings. A glance round his study—in the centre of which is a bagatelle board—shows the esteem in which he is held by his brother and sister artists by the large number of signed photographs that are to be seen. "What is the meaning of this?" we ask, pointing to a photograph of a distinguished contralto vocalist. "Well, she asked me for my photograph, and I sent it to her with the inscription:—

To the longest of her sex,
From the broadest of his kind.

In return I received from her this photograph, upon which she has written:—

To the broadest of his kind,
From the longest of her sex.
Clara Butt."

VIEWS ON SINGING.

Finally, it is interesting to listen to Mr. Davies as he states his views on singing and the study of the art of song. He is very emphatic upon the fatal mistake so often made by young singers of rushing into publicity before they have become thoroughly grounded in vocal technique. In this connection he pays a high tribute to the skill of Mr. Henry Russell, jun. (son of the "Cheer, boys, cheer" veteran), as a first-rate "foundation man." The importance of being well prepared cannot be over-estimated. That hard, relentless work is a sine quâ non as an element of success may be taken for granted. And then he very properly lays great stress upon the necessity of getting behind the mere notational hieroglyphics, so to speak, and by so doing to obtain that deep insight into the hidden meaning of the music which shall reveal the true beauties of its inmost soul. There is no more expressive, and therefore artistic, singer before the public than Ben Davies. Again, his career furnishes another instance—so frequently dwelt upon in the course of these biographical articles—of what may be achieved by steadfast perseverance, high ideals, and a patient continuance in well-doing. All honour to him for having attained his present position by sterling merit, straightforward methods, and earnest endeavour. Young singers may not only derive encouragement, but may learn many lessons from the career of this self-made and estimable man.

One more incident and we have done. On a recent occasion, during one of many walks and talks with him, the conversation turned upon the tenor solos in Mendelssohn's "Elijah." Mr. Davies thereupon remarked—with no thought that his words would ever appear in print—"I have been ten years trying to sing 'If with all your hearts,' and only a year ago did I begin to satisfy myself." The man who adopts such a creed as this and acts up to it is a true artist. He is worthy to occupy a high place in the roll of distinguished tenor singers of which this country has just cause to be proud.

SONG IN THE SYNAGOGUE.

By the Rev. Francis L. Cohen.

A note on the Maccabæan Hymn, which appeared in a recent number of The Musical Times, may possibly have led to the impression that there are many points of contact between the worship-music employed in Church and in Synagogue. Such an impression might indeed be carried away on hearing some of the choral numbers sung in synagogues, and hearing nothing else. For it is a Jewish characteristic to take a keen interest in all details of modern progress, while still keeping, more or less consciously, a firm hold upon the traditions of the past; and thus the passages which fall to the share of the choristers in Jewish worship are set to much the same kind of music as are similar passages in the rituals of the Christian churches. This is further due to the circumstance that choirs in synagogues did not exist before the present century, and have become general only in the present generation. Choral music had therefore to be newly procured, and it was of necessity modern. Yet the choral portion occupies but a minor position in the Synagogue Service, and the tendency now is even to construct that portion upon the basis of traditional material, as far as may be done.

UNACCOMPANIED VOCALISATION.

The traditional material is melody ever tending towards ornate elaboration, and it has throughout the centuries been chanted without instrumental accompaniment. At the present day, among all the forty-nine synagogues established in the London district, there is but one, the "Reform" synagogue, where an instrument is used at the Sabbath or Festival services. It is a pity that the organ became so crucial a point of contention when the Reform movement, which sought to establish a liberty of choice in ritual matters, and in many minor points broke away from Rabbinical tradition, first convulsed Jewry some two generations since. But something similar happened elsewhere, we remember, in connection with that same "kist o' whustles"; and if many Jews disliked the idea of employing the organ in public worship, because they regarded it as peculiarly a "Christian" instrument, so did the early Church experience compunctions in the matter of the organ, because men then asserted that it was a "Jewish" instrument.

A FENCE TO THE LAW.

Although musical instruments had been so largely employed in the Temple of Jerusalem, after the fall of the Jewish State the people for a long period voluntarily abstained from all use of music save in worship, and thus had no secular association with instruments. A Rabbinical "fence to the Law" came into force, which prohibited the use of instruments on the sacred days, on the ground of their then almost inevitably needing repair or tuning, and so tempting the performer to turn from art, which is not in itself prohibited on the Day of Rest, to labour, which is. The practice of centuries has lent sanctity to this protective prohibition; and thus the music of the Synagogue is still chanted without accompaniment on the Sabbath and the Festivals. But instruments are freely introduced at services on week-days; and it has for centuries been considered that instrumental music at Jewish marriages is even particularly desirable.

In yet another feature of its ritual the "Reform" congregation is isolated in its divergence from ancient tradition, for in all the other synagogues the prayers are not spoken, but intoned. This was the custom already in Temple times, when even the Levites in the Temple choir used to proceed to the synagogues to study and worship after taking part in the sacrificial ritual of the Sanctuary. From the very earliest days of the Synagogue the Jew has been exhorted to utter with the singing voice every word recited aloud in the Service. Already, therefore, ages ago, syllabic monotone must have begun to develop into cantillation, and a form of plain-song to come into existence.

CALLING UP.

At first, from the days of Ezra until the third or fourth century of the present era, the chanting of the praises, prayers, and lessons appears to have been the duty and privilege of private members of the congregation; and to this day ordinary worshippers (from three to eight in number, according to the importance of the occasion) are "called up" from their seats to the lectern to read the Scriptures in public. This they now do by proxy, returning thanks for the privilege and overlooking the Precentor during his reading. Yet in the case of a lad so honoured for the first time on the attainment of his religious majority, a congregant selected to commence or end each annual cycle of Pentateuchal lessons, or the person entrusted with the reading of the Prophetical lesson, the worshipper usually himself cantillates the section for which he is "called up."

THE PRECENTOR.

But it was already from a very early period found expedient that the recital of the lessons should be entrusted to a well skilled reader, and that the prayers should be led by an official who would be certain, because of his office, to be provided with a manuscript—for those were the days before the printing press had made books cheap enough for ordinary folk to acquire copies. With the ever-growing accretion of melismatic adornments to the traditional chants, a professional Precentor became a congregational necessity. Termed Maqrê (Reader) in the Temple, he was known as Shĕliakh Tsibbur (Messenger of the Congregation) or Khazzan (Overlooker) in the Synagogue; and already in the days of the Sanctuary had inaugurated that sequence of specialists in synagogal vocalisation by whom the tradition has been perpetuated. While these specialists have in each succeeding generation amplified their repertory according to the tonal fashion of their day, the vigour of tradition in Jewish observance has brought down to our own times many strains of hoar antiquity.

THE READING OF THE LAW.

The Reading of the Law was in Temple times the main object for which the people assembled in the synagogues. In the Dispersion it became even more the central point of the Jewish ritual, for the recital of the sacrifices took the place of the offerings themselves, when the Jews enjoyed access no longer to the one spot where sacrifices were permitted. As, with certain rare exceptions, it is at Morning Service that the Law and the Prophets are alone read, the Morning Service far excels those of the Afternoon and Evening in importance as well as in length. This Service falls on Sabbath and Festivals into two parts called "Morning" and "Additional," in accordance with the two sacrifices in the Temple on those days; and the Reading of the Law takes place between them. In some West-End synagogues the "Morning" Service is read at an early hour, and the congregation only attend in numbers later on, when the Reading of the Law is proceeded with. There is sometimes an additional lesson read in English, when the Revised Version is usually employed. Such a vernacular reading, of course, is recited with the speaking voice. But the Hebrew lessons, both Pentateuchal and Prophetical, are chanted.

CHANTING THE LESSONS.

The reader of the Pentateuchal lesson has to devote some time to previous study of the text, for while the cantillation is to be found designated in printed Bibles by a system of accentuation, the public lessons are invariably read from the unpointed text of the Scrolls. These consist of many sheets of vellum tacked together end to end, and the extremities each wound round an ornamental rod—this being the ancient way of making a book. Hebrew, like other Semitic tongues, has an alphabet of consonants only, read from right to left. The vowels are designated by little strokes and points added below or above the consonants voiced by them. The cantillation—and the syntax—are further marked by neumes or accents, small dots, strokes or curves, accompanying the vowel points. This punctuation has been in general use since about the sixth century; but in the more ancient form, as in the Scrolls read from by the officiant, only the consonantal text is given. Accordingly, the lesson, which averages over a hundred verses in length every Sabbath, must be carefully prepared, as may be gathered from the following transcriptions. In the Scroll the twenty-second chapter of Genesis, for example, begins as follows:—

ויהי אחר הדברים האלה והאלהים נסה
את אברהם ויאמר אליו אברהם ויאמר
הנני

This simply gives the following unvocalised text: Vyhy 'khr hdbrym h'lh vh'lhym nsh 't 'brhm vy'mr 'lyv 'brhm vy'mr hnny. But in a printed volume the same verse would be pointed, thus:—

וַיְהִי אַחַר הַדְּבָרִים הָאֵלֶּה וְהָאֱלֹהִים נִסָּה
אֶת־אַבְרָהָם וַיֹּאמֶר אֵלָיו אַבְרָהָם וַיֹּאמֶר
הִנֵּנִי :

This pointing enables one who is not scholar enough to recognise the inflections of the text without such assistance to read it with accuracy; and an ordinary English Jew would accordingly vocalise the verse as follows: Vayĕhi akhar haddĕvorim hoeilleh, vĕhoĕlauhim nissoh es Avrohom; vayaumer eilov, Avrohom, vayaumer hinneini (vowels as in Italian or German).

When the accents are added, the verse would appear fully pointed thus:—

וַיְהִ֗י אַחַר֙ הַדְּבָרִ֣ים הָאֵ֔לֶּה וְהָֽאֱלֹהִ֔ים נִסָּ֖ה
אֶת־אַבְרָהָ֑ם וַיֹּ֣אמֶר אֵלָ֔יו אַבְרָהָ֖ם וַיֹּ֥אמֶר
הִנֵּֽנִי׃

The accents, about thirty in number, constitute at once a syntactical and a musical notation, marking not alone the chant melody, but also the dichotomy, or division and sub-division into halves; for the Hebrew sentence, alike of prose and of verse, is constructed on the lines of the period in mensurate music, with half cadence and full cadence. The longer or more involved the sentence, the more elaborate accordingly is the melody of its cantillation, which is essentially a development of the original monotone recitative in the direction of facilitating the comprehension of what is uttered.

THE CHANT-ACCENTS.

The accents themselves are known as Nĕginoth (strings, musical notes) or Ta'amim (adornments, tropes). It is pretty clear that they are literally a cheirography, or rough diagram of the movement of the voice in declamation, as conventionally designated by the movements of the teacher's hand; and their musical value gives us a fair idea of that bardic intonation interpreting the text chanted, which for the ancients constituted melody, as tune does for us. The two systems now in use were settled by the Massoretic (punctuating) School of Tiberias, before the seventh century; but the cantillation must of course have existed in a well-developed form long before any such notation for it was invented. The vocal interpretation of the accents used in the poetical books—Psalms, Proverbs, Job—was still retained until about the fifteenth century; but it has since been forgotten, owing to the greater congregational advantage of an unvarying chant for poems consisting of verses of fairly equal length. But the other system, for the books recited by an individual reader, where the verses are not so regular, is still in constant employment. According to the use of the congregation, the particular occasion determines which one of several parallel musical interpretations shall be given to the accents. Jews nowadays follow one of two main Minhagim or uses, although many local variations are also to be recognised. These uses are purely liturgical, and by no means rise to the level of sectarian distinction. They scarcely differ in anything beyond the pronunciation of the vowels and the musical intonation of the Services; and even these differences are in detail rather than in principle. These main uses are those of the Ashkĕnazim or "Germans"—broadly those Jews whose ancestors of the Middle Ages were resident in Teutonic lands—and of the Sĕphardim or "Spaniards"—broadly, those Jews whose ancestors have dwelt among the Latin and Arab peoples. The vast majority of Jews in these days follow the use of the Ashkĕnazim, which is the one particularly dealt with here.

MODAL DIFFERENTIATION.

In each of the uses the same musical principle is followed out, a principle which may be traced back to the Temple itself, if my interpretation of the Psalm-headings has any force. According to this principle, all chanting, whether of the lessons or the prayers, follows out one system on well recognised lines; but the cantillation or plain-chant of each particular Service falls in a particular mode or scale-form anciently set apart for that Service on account of some æsthetic peculiarity or appropriateness. These modes are all of an antique or Oriental character, and include not only those tonalities familiar to students of the Church plain-song, but also others preserved in the Byzantine and Armenian traditions, in the folk-song of Eastern Europe, or in Perso-Arab and even Hindu melody. The modal feeling of Jewish worship-music is thus still in many ways reminiscent of the musical theory and practice of Eastern Asia, which dominated the ancient world, and still rules from the Slav lands of Europe away to Southern India. Using wherever possible the nomenclature of the Gregorian modes (although it must be borne in mind that these are by no means scrupulously followed), we find that the use of the Ashkĕnazim, who, it must be remembered, have been resident among the peoples of Northern Europe for something like twenty centuries, finds an æsthetic correspondence between occasion and tonality as follows:—

SERVICE	Gregorian Mode.
LESSONS.—Pentateuchal (Ordinary Days)	Æolian.
,, ,, (Penitential Days)	Mixolydian.
,, Prophetical (all Days)	Hypodorian.
Book of Lamentations	Hypoæolian.
,, Esther	Hypolydian.
PRAYERS.—Sabbath Eve	Mixolydian.
,, Morning	Chromatic Phrygian.
,, Afternoon	Dorian.
Festival Eve	Æolian.
,, Morning and Afternoon	Mixolydian.
Penitential Eve	Ionian.
,, Morning and Afternoon	Phrygian.
Daily Eve	Chromatic Hypolydian.
,, Morning and Afternoon	Lydian.

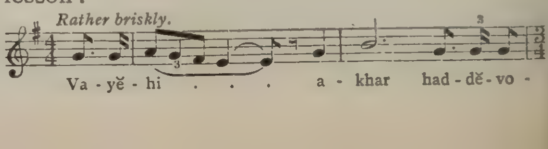
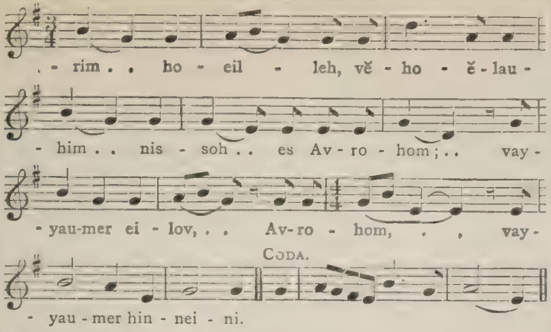
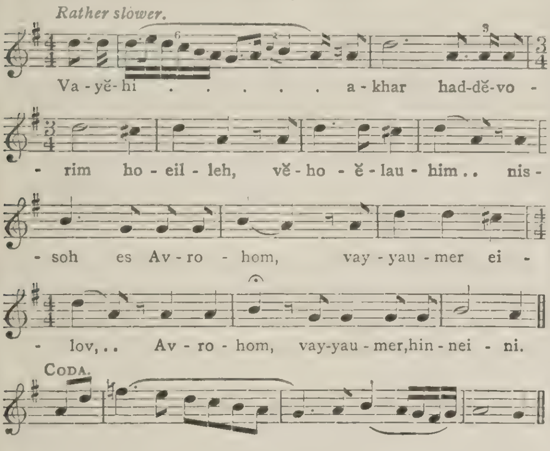
The accents of the verse of Scripture given above would accordingly be chanted as follows when read as part of an ordinary Pentateuchal lesson:—





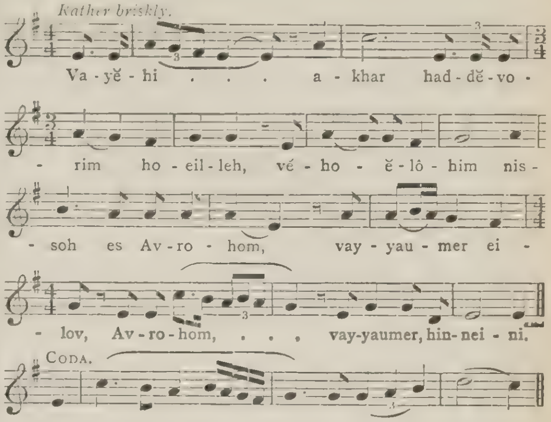
. . rim . . ho - eil - leh, vĕ - ho - ĕ - lau -
- him . . nis - soh . . es Av - ro - hom; . . vay -
- yau-mer ei - lov, . . Av - ro - hom, . . vay -
Coda.
- yau - mer hin - nei - ni.

On the Penitential Days, however, it would be chanted in another mode, thus:—



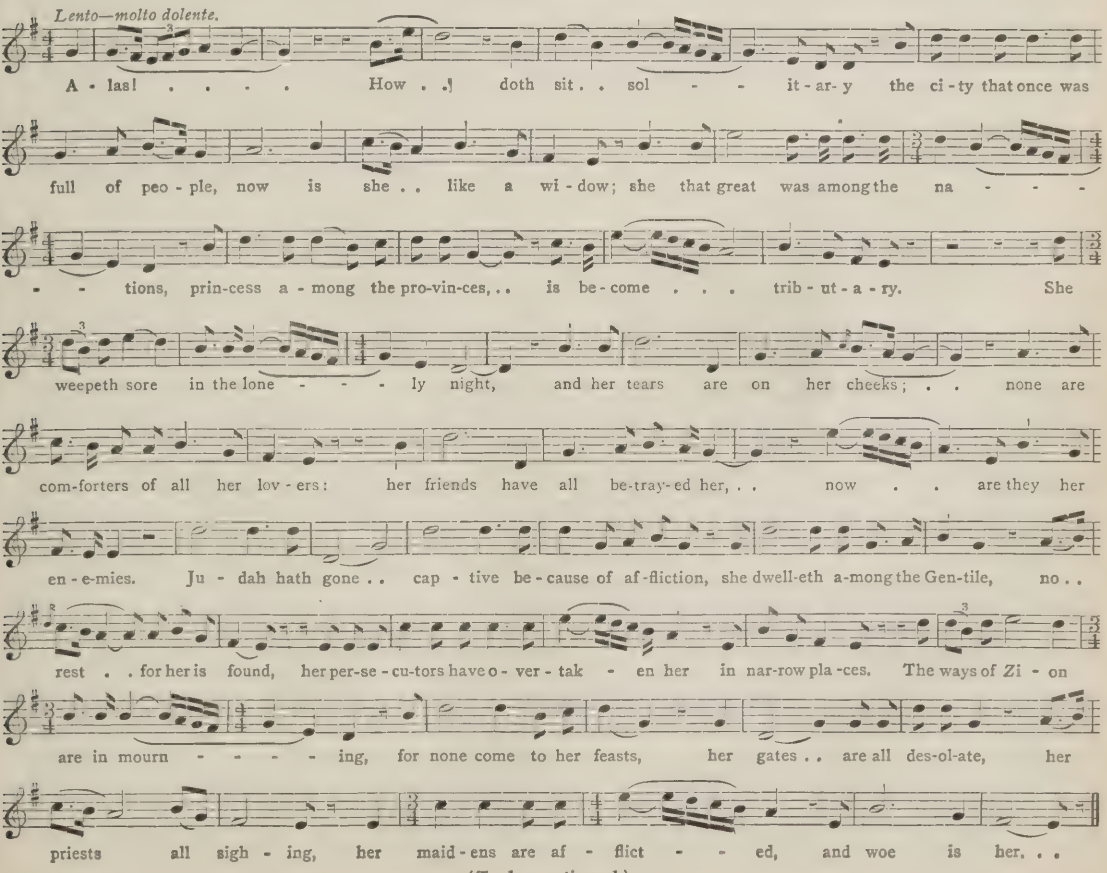
Rather slower.
Va - yĕ - hi . . . . . a - khar had-dĕ-vo -
- rim ho - eil - leh, vĕ - ho - ĕ - lau - him . . nis -
- soh es Av - ro - hom, vay - yau - mer ei -
- lov, . . Av - ro - hom, vay-yau - mer,hin - nei - ni.
Coda.

Again, if it formed portion of a lesson from the Prophets, its accents would be quite otherwise interpreted as regards their tonality, in the following manner:—



Rather briskly.
Va - yĕ - hi . . . a - khar had - dĕ - vo -
- rim ho - eil - leh, vé - ho - ĕ - lô - him nis -
- soh es Av - ro - hom, vay - yau - mer ei -
- lov, Av - ro - hom, . . . vay-yaumer, hin - nei - ni.
Coda.

Each of these modal interpretations of the accents has a "jubilation" as coda for the last words of each section, a sort of musical "Here endeth the Lesson," the form of which is shown in each of the above illustrations. To make clear the manner in which the cantillation elucidates the text, and how the "distinctions" denoted by each several accent blend smoothly into a homogeneous chant, a transcription with English text of the first verses of Lamentations may be added.



Lento—molto dolente.
A - las! . . . . How . . doth sit . . sol - - it - ar - y the ci - ty that once was

A BODLEIAN TREASURE.

Amongst the precious possessions of the Bodleian Library is an ancient tome of special interest to musicians—a valuable volume such as a music-loving antiquary might press to his lips and reverently kiss. A recent visit to that storehouse of learning at Oxford, with so genial a cicerone as the ex-Professor of Music, gave us the opportunity of personally examining the old manuscript book in which he and his family have taken a very keen interest. Five hundred years have come and gone since the scribes' hands passed over its pages. And here to-day, in a wonderfully well-preserved condition, this fine collection of fifteenth century compositions by Dufay and his contemporaries reposes in the great library associated with the name of Sir Thomas Bodley.

With his characteristic zeal for the diffusion of musical knowledge, Sir John Stainer, with the assistance of his son and daughter, has given to the world a very large measure of the contents of this Dufay collection in the handsome volume which forms the subject of the present article. The complete title of the book is :—

EARLY BODLEIAN MUSIC.

Dufay | and his contemporaries | FIFTY COMPOSITIONS | (Ranging from about A.D. 1400 to 1440) | Transcribed from MS. Canonici misc. 213, in the Bodleian Library, Oxford | by | J. F. R. Stainer, B.C.L., M.A. | and | C. Stainer.

With an Introduction by | E. W. B. Nicholson, M.A., Bodley's Librarian | and a Critical Analysis of the Music by | Sir John Stainer, M.A., Mus. Doc., Oxford; Hon. D.C.L. and Mus. Doc. Durham; | Professor of Music in the University of Oxford.

No better description of this Dufay book in its original form could be given than that furnished by the masterly prefaces—four in number—preceding the musical extracts in the printed volume now before us.

First, in regard to Bodley's librarian, who has shown a practical interest in the matter deserving of the highest praise. In an Introduction abounding in erudition, Mr. Nicholson contributes a valuable essay in regard to the nationality of the music and the story of Dufay's contemporaries. He says :—

> In the summer of 1895, when I suggested to our Professor of Music to undertake the publication of facsimiles of early Bodleian manuscript music, all the MSS. were put before him which I had noted as containing secular compositions earlier than the sixteenth century. Mr. C. L. Stainer then examined the indices of all our catalogues of MSS., under such heads as I suggested to him, and in doing so almost immediately came across the mention of MS. Canonici misc. 213.
> This MS. is briefly described on col. 583 of the quarto catalogue of our Greek and Latin Canonici MSS., published in 1854, and a good many years ago Mr. T. W. Jackson, Fellow of Worcester College, had made some extracts from it; otherwise, so far as my knowledge goes, it had attracted no attention whatever. I myself must have opened it in 1887, but, knowing nothing then as to the rarity of fifteenth century continental secular music, had made no note of it, and had forgotten its existence.
> The MS. is the 213th in the "miscellaneous" division of a collection of MSS. bought by the Bodleian in 1817, which had belonged to Matteo Luigi Canonici, a Venetian Jesuit, who was born August 5, 1727, and died in October or November, 1805. This collection contained some 2,047 volumes, of which a large proportion—probably, indeed, a clear majority—were written in Italy.

After giving an exhaustive analysis of its caligraphy, Mr. Nicholson thus summarizes the transcription and contents of the collection :—

> Consequently, I infer that our MS. is the work of mixed ecclesiastics and laymen, copying from collections also made by mixed ecclesiastics and laymen.
> The contents of the volume place these hypotheses almost beyond doubt. Of the hundreds of pieces in it, four-fifths are purely secular, and almost entirely amatory; such a collection would not have been made by, or copied by, a merely ecclesiastical society. But among the sacred compositions there are no fewer than twelve settings of the Gloria in excelsis and no fewer than six of the Apostles' Creed—both parts of the daily cathedral service—and these would scarcely have been collected by, or copied by, a merely lay society.

Following upon a complete tabulation of the various composers whose muse enriches the volume, Bodley's learned librarian surmises that the transcriptions were made in Milan, and for this reason :—

> No doubt the fact that both Canonici and Soranzo were Venetians, and that Venice is specified as the place where two of the pieces were composed, favours Venice. But I have already observed that the first hand in the MS. sometimes uses -m for -n, a Milanese but (so far as I am aware) not a Venetian characteristic; and I have since found that the second hand occasionally does the same—e.g., on f. 63^{v} he twice writes leyfom for (e)leyson, and on f. 64^{v} he writes Amem. But there is no reason why the original collections should not have been copied before 1440 by Dufay's friends in Milan and a transcript made from that copy (into our Canonici volume) at a later date for the use of musicians in Venice.

The next section consists of eight pages of the old tome beautifully reproduced in facsimile. The advantage of being able to inspect samples of the originals without necessitating a visit to the Bodleian (though such a visit is always a pleasant experience to the book lover) is obvious.

"Chapter I.," largely biographical and admirably written, is the joint production of Mr. J. F. R. Stainer (Sir John's eldest son) and his sister, Miss C. Stainer, who, as the authoress of the excellent primer on "Violin Makers," is so often masculined, if not maligned, as "Mr." C. Stainer! Quotation is again necessary :—

> The important manuscript from which these songs are selected is written on 140 folios or 280 pages of paper, and contains over 300 pieces of vocal music (mostly in three parts), written on a five-lined stave and in the white or open-headed notation which began to come into use in the early part of the fifteenth century. With the exception of seven pages of music written in the old black notation, some of which may possibly date from the fourteenth century, the whole of this music was probably composed in the first half of the fifteenth century: the historical events alluded to all fall within that period, the dates actually given range from 1422 to 1436, and the names of composers who are known to have flourished in the latter half of the century, such as Caron, Busnois, and Okeghem, are conspicuous by their absence. The period in which the music was composed may therefore be considered as definitely fixed.

John Dunstable, unfortunately, does not appear amongst the composers; and thus many will share in the regret of the editor and editress at the absence of his name.

Sir John Stainer was the first to draw attention to the manuscript in a paper that he read before the Musical Association on November 12, 1895. One of its special features is that it contains an unusual proportion of secular compositions.

> The contrast between the freedom of many of these secular pieces and the antiquated crudity of ecclesiastical pieces by the same composers is very marked, and shows the injustice of attempting to gauge the state of the art of music at this early date by reference to masses and church music alone. It is for this reason that we have selected so large a proportion of secular compositions for transcription here; only two sacred compositions have been included, and these are transcribed only because they are by composers who are mentioned by a contemporary writer as representative musicians of their time, and because there are no examples of their secular work to be found in our MS.

By no means the least valuable section of this "Chapter I." is a complete biography of Dufay, carefully compiled from original and authentic sources. Here are some extracts:—

> Guillermus du Fay—so his name is spelt in the Bodleian MS. and on his tombstone—was born (probably in Hainault) before the year 1400. He received his musical education at Cambrai in the capacity of Chorister, for such is probably the meaning of the word "Chorialis" found on his tombstone; and in his will he leaves money to the Cambrai altar boys, "pueris altaris ut orent pro me, qui in eorum ordine puer serviens honores radicitus et commoda ex ipso servitio me consecutum profiteor." It is certain that Dufay was never director of the singing and music school attached to the Cathedral, for M. Houdoy has been able to give from the Cathedral archives a complete list of the directors from 1370 to 1500, and in that list Dufay's name does not appear.
> The musical services at Cambrai appear to have reached a very high degree of excellence about this time, for there is extant an interesting letter addressed by Philip of Luxemburg to the Chapter of Cambrai in 1428 in which the singing in the Cathedral is said to surpass in beauty anything to be heard in Europe; and this is borne out by the fact that from 1420 onwards the singers in the Papal choir were largely drawn from Cambrai. It was probably at Cambrai that Dufay's two songs, "Je me complains piteusement" and "Adieu ces bons vins de Lannoys," dated 1425 and 1426 respectively in the Bodleian MS., were written. From December, 1428, to August, 1433, and again from June, 1435, to June, 1437, the name of "Guill. du Fay" appears in the lists of the singing men in the Papal choir, preserved in the Papal archives and printed by Dr. Haberl.
> It was customary at this time for members of the Papal choir to receive ecclesiastical preferment, often with a special indulgence annexed, dispensing with the necessity of residence; and we find that on the 12th November, 1436, Dufay was appointed to a canonry at Cambrai, and it was probably soon afterwards that he was presented by Philip of Burgundy to a canonry in the Church of St. Waldetrude at Mons; both of these offices he held till his death.
> Dufay died on the 27th of November, 1474, and was buried, as he had desired, in the chapel of St. Etienne, beneath the tombstone he had himself caused to be made, the tombstone which still exists, though unfortunately mutilated, and which represents the resurrection of our Lord, with the worthy canon ("venerabilis" his contemporaries delighted to call him) in the attitude of prayer. This tombstone, which was formerly in the collection of M. Victor de Lattre, bears the inscription—"Hic inferius jacet venerabilis vir magister Guillermus du Fay musicus baccalarius in decretis olim hujus ecclesie chorialis deinde canonicus et sancte Waldetrudis montensis qui obiit anno domini millesimo quadringesimo (LXX°IIII°) die XXVII° mensis Novembris."

After the death of M. Victor de Lattre, in 1889, this tombstone was sold, with his other effects, by auction; and though enquiries have been made, it seems too certain that this venerable relic, if not actually lost, has at least fallen into unsympathetic hands.

One very interesting fact brought to light is that the compositions of Dufay necessitated the addition of three notes (F, G, and A) above, and three notes (D, E, and F) below, the system of Guido:—

> It was by transposition that these additional notes were arrived at, and it would be quite characteristic of the conservatism of the age, that musicians should have bowed to tradition and authority so far as to write nothing that would exceed the limits of the Guidonian system, while at the same time constantly evading those limits in practice by the simple expedient of transposing the music up or down, so as to enable the forbidden notes to be sung though not written. It would, in fact, be in exact analogy to the practice that undoubtedly prevailed with regard to musica ficta. Doubtless too, as the art of singing was more carefully cultivated, and highly trained choirs, such as that of Cambrai, came into existence, it was found that the Guidonian system did not, as had previously been supposed, express the absolute limits within which the human voice could exert itself with pleasant effect, and it is probable that all that Dufay did was to protest against these additional notes being excluded from the gamut, for no better reason than that they were outside the Guidonian limits and could not be accommodated on the Guidonian "hand."

An example of the use of secular melodies in the services of the Church is furnished in the tenor (lowest) part of Dufay's ditty "La belle se siet," which has a strong likeness to the tone now used for the "Miserere"!

After identifying the various musicians whose compositions are contained in the volume, the mode of the performance of these songs is treated of thus:—

> It is abundantly clear from our MS. that some form of instrumental accompaniment was employed; to take one instance only—Dufay's song "Ce jour de l'an"—it will be seen from the facsimile that there are three groups of notes, one at the beginning, one in the middle, and one at the end of each of the three vocal parts, under which no words are written. It is possible of course that in the case of the two latter groups the last preceding syllable of the words was intended to be carried on in spite of the intervening rests: numerous instances of this may be found in music of the period, and Thomas Morley quotes a passage from a motet of Dunstable's to illustrate the absurdity of the practice; but with regard to the first group of notes, it is clear that they can only have been written as an introductory symphony for instruments, such as viols, preceding and leading up to the entry of the voices, and we shall probably not err in supposing that these instruments were employed not only for symphonies, but to accompany the voices in unison throughout. In the case of "Ce jour de l'an" the words are written out in full under each part, but in many, indeed in the majority of the songs in this MS., the words are placed under the upper part only, while the tenor and the contra-tenor parts have only the first two or three words written at their beginning, generally in such a way as not to correspond with the notes above them. Perhaps one is not justified in inferring from this that in every case where it occurs the lower parts were not intended to be sung at all, but to be played only, but in some cases this must clearly be so.

Mr. J. F. R. Stainer contributes (in Chapter III.) a scholarly dissertation on mensurable music and its translation into present day notation. It is well known that awful mistakes have been made in the process of transcribing fifteenth century notation, even by those who have been looked up to as experts on the subject; but in this chapter Mr. Stainer assuredly deserves the credit of having supplied for the first time reliable directions in regard to the method of accurate transcription. Some idea of his and Miss Stainer's handiwork in this respect may be gathered from the following fac-simile of the melody of Dufay's "Quel fronte signorille." It is photographed from the old book in the Bodleian: underneath is its equivalent in modern notation. It will be observed that at the beginning of the song Dufay uses his musical monogram "Du fa y." The sign of prolation (time-signature) is O, indicating tempus perfectum—i.e., our triple rhythm.

Sir John Stainer (in Chapter IV.) brings up the rear in an exhaustive disquisition upon the music contained in the volume and its special characteristics. It is, in fact, a learned essay on early music of the greatest possible value towards the history of the art. A few extracts here follow. First, as to the many crudities and archaisms in the music of this early period, Sir John says:—

> The creative genius could find no outlet for his invention or sentiment in taking a fragment of a popular melody, drawing it out into long notes, using it as a canto fermo, over which tiresome and meaningless parts sung to the sacred words of the Mass were interlaced with an ingenuity which few could analyse and which nobody cared for. But in setting the poet's lyrics his hands were untied, and while freely utilising the old resources of his art, he could also strive to discover new paths, new scenes.

In studying these old-world songs the reader is asked to lay aside his present ideas of what is right or wrong in the grammar of composition, and to place himself in a Guidonian frame of mind.

> If he can do this, he will first notice that the scales here used come much nearer to our modern tonality than is apparently the case, owing to the undoubted use of musica ficta, "feigned" or "artificial" music. Singers and players were not only permitted, but instructed, to sharpen or flatten notes under certain conditions when no corresponding accidental was written. The origin of this may probably be traced to the traditional antipathy to the tritone, or interval of three whole tones. This antipathy, which took root in a very early period of music's growth, exists to this day to a limited extent. We are more tolerant than our ancestors, but we still, in strict counterpoint, forbid the appearance of the two notes of the interval in consecutive chords.

In regard to the important question of the two sorts of b that were required—"one to act as fa (the fourth) in the hexachord of F, the other as mi (the third) in the hexachord of G; so that the latter b was made hard (durum), that is to say, natural"—Sir John observes:—

> He [the trained musician] will be tempted to pause here in order to contemplate the remarkable fact that this particular spot in the hexachords, where two sorts of b come into contact, is the veritable birth-place of modern music. When men realised that by placing the bémol > (flat) against any note it might be understood that the note should be flattened, and that the square □ (a natural) could restore it to its normal position; also, that by prolonging the sides of a natural a sign might be made which would direct the sharpening of any given note, the whole field of modern chromatic music, with its unbounded resources, was thrown open to the composer. Because it enabled men to carry a diatonic system into any pitch they chose, by giving in a signature exact and unmistakable directions as to the required position of tones and semitones in order to produce a diatonic scale from any one of these self-same tones and semitones; whilst the same set of signs (used as accidentals) enabled them to pass into and out of the whole cycle of keys.

Sir John Stainer next calls attention to the interesting subject of the early evolution of key-tonality. Here are his words:—

> But, though musica ficta was an active agent in overthrowing Church modality, the building up of our modern key system was a slow process, and in Dufay's time there was still much to be done. These pages show that the key of C had already become firmly established. Some few write very definitely in the key of F. Examples of D minor are less numerous. Attempts to settle in the key of G minor are generally very unsatisfactory; but Dufay, who is always well ahead of his contemporaries, gives us a movement in G minor, containing a half-close on its dominant D. He also gives us a four-part song in G minor of great interest. The student will find plenty of material if he desires to pursue this subject farther.

The difficulties of our ancestors in regard to modulation are thus animadverted upon:—

> But the finding and determination of any given key and the power of moving out of it into another key are very distinct processes, and here we trace the shortcomings and struggles of our musical ancestors. Of course, modulation could not exist as an art until composers had realised the fact that one of the most valuable privileges of modern tonality is that of being able to "shift" our scale into any other pitch whilst strictly retaining the same order of tones and semitones. From whatever pitch a composer of to-day chooses, whether C, C sharp, D, E flat, or any other of our twelve semitonal divisions of the octave, he can and does still carry the same scale about with him. This has undoubtedly its advantages, inasmuch as it opens out a wide field for contrast, in allowing us to produce musical sentences which are exactly alike melodically and harmonically, in interesting juxtaposition of pitch. But as a set-off to this advantage, of which modern musicians have made so much use, we ought not to forget that we have reduced the number of our scales to one, instead of having seven or eight, or, if authentic modes only are recognised, four. This is not the place to discuss the question whether the art of music has gained or lost by the exchange; the day may yet come when composers may find new resources in the restoration of old Modes. What we learn from these early fifteenth century writers is, first, that they began to discover the impossibility of separating harmonization from definite key tonality; next, that when they left temporarily the few keys at their disposal in the search for contrast of key, they had not grasped the possibility of shifting bodily the same scale-form to any other required pitch.

No less to the point are the remarks upon imitation and rhythm—the latter the "bones" of music (pace Hans Richter):—

> But the imitative style is always more or less antagonistic to definite period-lengths, and when not imitative, our authors do not seem to strive after regular rhythms. But a close examination of their music shows that they revelled in variety and contrast and also in the combination of subordinate rhythmic figures. It is not without interest to note that the evolution of the art of music tended, about the middle of the eighteenth century, towards extreme regularity of period-lengths and of rhythmic figures; in fact, up to quite recent days music had become so "periodic" in its texture as to appear a succession of geometrical figures, bearing no nearer relation to the art of music than a child's kaleidoscope does to a stained-glass window. Modern musicians have rebelled against this, and have boldly asserted their freedom to select periods of irregular lengths, and to break up their periods into a great variety of rhythmic figures. But in thus doing, they have unconsciously drifted back into one of the resources of our art which existed prior to the dynasty of Regularity; and the young composer who, in order to prove his position as an advanced musician, by mixing or contrasting duple, triple, quadruple, and quintuple subordinate rhythms, is practically, in this respect, imitating those ancestors whom he himself could certainly instruct in so many other branches. But the student who goes through these pages must never forget that the bars have been inserted for his convenience only, and that he must, in his mind, hear the music as if unbarred. If he can achieve this, he will find that each of the rhythmic figures of various lengths and textures which are often interwoven with such dexterity demands its own special manner of interpretation and sphere of influence, untrammelled by those tyrannical "uprights" which sometimes make a line of modern music look as if it were a portion of a yard-measure divided into inches.

It seems that our ancestors experienced a keen delight in listening to those "consecutives" which our modern harmony-men take a delight no less keen in pouncing upon and blue-pencilling. But the "consecutives" in this book open up a most interesting historical fact, not hitherto suspected—namely, that the Organum and Diaphony (movement in fourths and fifths) must have held complete control over the music of Church and people for a couple of centuries at least. All historians touch lightly upon Diaphony as if it were a mere passing phase of musical evolution, whereas this book proves that up to the very threshold of modern music consecutive triads were loved!

> But if the composers of the first half of the fifteenth century were still groping after facility of modulation and contrast of keys, in one respect they advanced to a remarkable degree—namely, in their boldness in constructing chords and the large number they brought into use. Future historians of music will have to chronicle this fact; hitherto, so little music of this period has been attainable that they have practically had no data to deal with. Another fact of great importance is brought out clearly by these pages—namely, that consecutive fifths and consecutive triads, so far from being thought objectionable, gave real pleasure to everybody, including the most artistic musicians of the day. This must, I think, be accepted as a proof that the influence of diaphony and organum was more widespread and lasting than has been supposed. Many historians touch upon diaphony as a sort of barbarous experiment, which undoubtedly had a trial because nothing better could at the time be hit upon, but which, if not actually discarded as ugly and offensive, was soon ousted by a more legitimate form of harmony. This, however, is only partially true. The music of this manuscript shows beyond doubt, in my opinion, that the various consecutions of octaves, fourths, and fifths must have been for a very considerable period universally accepted, and have become thoroughly ingrained in the minds and hearts alike of musicians and people. If this is accepted as a fact, these fifty compositions will appear to us in their true light; they are not the work of men who wrote faulty progressions of consecutives because they had received no training or were devoid of artistic sentiment, but of men actually taking part in the evolution of modern harmony, albeit with the shreds of old tastes and decaying methods still clinging around them; we must neither blame nor despise them when we wade through their crudities; on the contrary, we must respect and admire them for the bold efforts they made to break through the fetters of the past in order to step out into fresh fields of thought, to search for new resources of art, and to cull the earliest blossoms of poetic expression.

The remainder of the book—its practical portion—consists of fifty examples from the MS. Canonici misc. 213, in the Bodleian, translated into modern notation—open (vocal) score with a sub-imposed compressed score. To give examples of this section of the volume would occupy more space than we can afford. The reader should make himself acquainted with the actual transcripts. In mastering the contents of the book the student will find much to interest him and not a little by way of instruction.

In conclusion, we must not omit to refer to the admirable glossary and the index to the whole contents of the Dufay MS. in the Bodleian, which is on the same scale of completeness that characterises the whole production. The excellent manner in which the book is presented to the reader calls forth the highest praise—its printing, engraving, and internal appearance blend in perfect harmony with its handsome gold and white exterior. Finally, not only may this be pronounced a monumental work, but it is a credit to English scholarship; moreover, the volume is one that adds further renown to a name honoured in English music—the name of Stainer.

The British Museum has recently acquired an interesting collection of manuscripts that formerly belonged to George Thomson, of Edinburgh, "the friend of Burns." It will be remembered that Thomson, an enthusiastic and successful collector of the melodies of Scotland, Wales, and Ireland, secured the services of Beethoven, Haydn, Weber, Hummel, and some lesser lights to write symphonies and instrumental accompaniments to these folk-songs. The letters and musical manuscripts that Thomson received from his distinguished arrangers form the present collection, though we understand that there are no musical autographs by Beethoven. Extracts from the correspondence and the history of these "arrangements" have been given by Mr. J. Cuthbert Hadden in his "Life" of George Thomson. One letter from Hummel, not mentioned by Mr. Hadden, may, however, be quoted in its unaltered English. The letter, which refers to "Three Scotsch Songs, accompany'd by J. N. Hummel," and is dated "Weimar, the 4th April, 1832," took fourteen days on its journey to Edinburgh. Hummel writes:—

> Dear Mr. Thomson!
> A great deal of business and an indisposition was the reason you did not receive these songs a long time ago allready. Occasion to send them to you by a privat way being very seldom, I thought it best to send them by the post in the form of a lettre as the quickest and shortest way. I hope you will be content with my accompaniment and sinphonies, being done quit as you desired it. In No. 3, in the 6th bar of the voice, I aggiunged a flat by a [natural], which you may put out again, if it don't please you, but I found it so more adapted to the word "Death."
> Your truly friend,
> J. N. Hummel.

The song referred to begins "What ails this heart of mine?" It is impossible to say if Thomson approved of Hummel's "tinkering" suggestion, or whether he was "put out" by it, as the song is not to be found in the published collection of the songs.

The programme of Mr. W. C. Hammond's 250th recital at the Second Congregational Church, Holyoke, Mass., was illustrated by a view of Peter Schoffer's design for Arnold Schlick's "Spiegel der Orgelmacher und Organisten," Mayence, 1511. The points of interest appearing in this ancient design are: The organ is played apparently by the old sliders instead of by keys, the organist being a lady, probably a nun; there is a surpliced choir of three boys and two men; the soprano part being supported by a man playing upon the old treble cornet; and the organ wind supply being provided by two fair-sized bellows, raised and depressed by the hands of the blowers. It would be difficult to imagine harmony beyond two parts being played under such conditions. The organist is probably merely supporting the treble and bass parts. The members of the little choir are all looking over one large copy, in accordance with ancient practice. What can be seen of the notation suggests unmeasured music, with the white or open notes.

Superior persons both at home and abroad have so often told us that we, in England, are only an art-consuming and not an art-producing country, that we have been in some danger of believing the assertion. From time to time, however, come pleasant reminders that our native composers are not so wholly contemptible in foreign eyes as some would have us suppose. The present season has witnessed the production at Monte Carlo of M. de Lara's new opera "Messaline," a work which was received with much enthusiasm in that most cosmopolitan of musical centres; and now from the same quarter comes news of equally cheerful significance.

M. Léon Jehin, the famous conductor who has for some years been intimately associated with the musical affairs of Monte Carlo, wishes to enlarge his orchestral répertoire. In this connection he has officially expressed his desire to include all that is most worthily representative of British music. Our countrymen's names, it is true, have not been wanting from the programmes of M. Jehin's admirable classical concerts, but they have been infrequent of appearance. But now the conductor has determined to set before his public some of the most characteristic works of our younger composers, as well as of those whose reputations are already solidly established. We understand that M. Jehin will include in his future concerts the following works: Mr. Cowen's "Four English Dances in the olden style," Mr. Elgar's "Imperial March," and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's "Four Characteristic Waltzes." The news of M. Jehin's intentions must be gratifying alike to English composers and English amateurs.

We have been desired by one of the lay clerks of Gloucester Cathedral, and we gladly accede to the request, to remove any misapprehension that may have been caused by a sentence in the biography of Dr. Harford Lloyd which appeared in our June issue. It is therein stated (p. 373) that "the lay clerks declined to take part in these services"—the reference being to the special nave services that Dr. Lloyd initiated at Gloucester soon after he became organist of that Cathedral. As a matter of fact, the lay clerks had a signed agreement that they should each receive a fee of five shillings for any special service at which they sang, and this sum was always paid. One day the Dean (not the present holder of the office) asked the lay clerks if they would be willing to waive their right to their five-shilling remuneration. This request the gentlemen of the choir respectfully "declined," and therefore they did not take part in the special (extra) services. Lay clerks are not by any means overpaid officials in cathedral establishments, and considering the smallness of the amount, the work to be done—in singing through a whole oratorio and, in all probability, interpreting the solos in it—they doubtless felt perfectly justified in their action. Not a few will be prepared to take their view of the case.

The Feis Ceoil has issued the syllabus of composers' Competitions for the 1900 Festival (the fourth). The prizes offered are for the best cantata for solo voices, chorus, and orchestra; for the best orchestral composition, string quartet, and twelve or thirteen minor forms of composition. The money prizes amount in value to close upon £100, but composers are more likely to be attracted to compete by the fact that the Feis committee practically undertakes to produce the compositions under the best possible conditions at the expense of the Association. Composers are thus enabled to get a hearing for their works under favourable auspices. All particulars can be obtained from the Hon. Secretaries, Feis Ceoil Office, 19, Lincoln Place, Dublin.

Several of our Metropolitan and Provincial contemporaries have referred to our July number in terms of gratifying appreciation. A London daily newspaper, in mentioning the fac-simile reproduction of the old Philharmonic programme of May 27, 1844, states that "Richter, at the age of thirteen, played Beethoven's Violin Concerto, with Mendelssohn at the conductor's desk." To have accomplished this feat Richter must have been a prodigy of prodigies, as at that time he was only thirteen months old. No: the statement is, we fear, purely Fiddle-de-dee. It was the thirteen-year-old Joachim, and not the thirteen months Richter, who played on that eventful occasion fifty-five years ago.

The first Swaledale Tournament of Song will be held at Richmond, Yorkshire, on September 27 and 28. The various competitions, for senior and junior candidates, and numbering in all eighteen classes, will include choral and solo singing, sight reading, pianoforte playing, violin playing, &c. Full particulars may be obtained from the hon. secretaries, Misses C. and M. Yeoman, Prior House, Richmond, Yorkshire. The object of the tournament is stated to be "the encouragement of vocal and instrumental music in Swaledale and the surrounding districts." It will have many sympathisers and well-wishers.

A pitched battle on the subject of pitch has been raging in the columns of various London newspapers during the past month. A letter from Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons to the Press—a copy of which will be found in our correspondence columns—opened the fusillade. This is no new question, but commonsense is lending its aid towards a proper settlement. There can be no question that the Diapason normal is the right standard of pitch, and every musician should, by precept and example, influence public opinion towards its general adoption.

Under the honorary presidency of Dr. Oscar Fleischer, an "International Musical Society" has been founded in Berlin, the principal objects of which are to facilitate historical research and to promote the interchange of ideas amongst its members on various subjects connected with the art. Branches of this excellent Society have already been formed in Leipzig (presidents: Professor Kretzschmar and Dr. Riemann) and in Vienna. Will London be invited to form a branch?

The composer of "Kimi-ga-Yo," the Japanese National Anthem, is Herr Eckert. This gentleman is about to leave Yokohama, after twenty years' residence in Japan, where he has been zealously labouring in the cause of European music in the Land of the Rising Sun.

Enthusiasm, of a temperature akin to the tropical atmosphere of the past month, characterised a very pleasant function held in the concert-room of the Royal Academy of Music on the 21st ult. The occasion was to celebrate—or rather to anticipate by one week—the silver wedding of Sir Alexander and Lady Mackenzie by the presentation to them of an address of congratulation signed by the whole of the professorial staff, and a massive silver salver from past and present students as a mark of affectionate esteem. Mr. Walter Macfarren, the senior professor of the Academy, in handing these tokens of regard to the gratified recipients, delivered an eloquent and felicitous speech, and Sir Alexander acknowledged the gifts in equally heartfelt words. The text of the address is as follows:—

> We, the members of the Professorial and Administrative Staff of the Royal Academy of Music, congratulate you with the utmost cordiality on the attainment of your Silver Wedding and upon your twenty-five years of happy wedded life, and in presenting you with this address and Lady Mackenzie with a basket of flowers, as a very small mark of our respect and esteem, we desire to express the earnest hope that the happy consummation of your Silver Wedding may be followed by that which is designated as Golden, and that a quarter of a century hence you and your beloved wife may be still together in the enjoyment of good health, and surrounded by troops of affectionate and admiring friends.
> July 28, 1899. (The signatures follow.)

The chorus of congratulations and good wishes to the Principal and Lady Mackenzie, on the 21st ult., will find an echo far beyond the walls of the "old place" in Tenterden Street.

John Sebastian Bach's organ in St. John's Church, Leipzig, upon which the great cantor used to play during the last years of his life, is for sale! It is the work of the notable Leipzig organ-builder, Johann Scheibe, and was "opened" by Bach in 1744. Adelung, referring to the instrument in his "Musica mechanica Organædi," says: "This organ of St. John, after having undergone the most rigorous examination ever applied to like instrument, has been pronounced absolutely faultless by Herren Joh. Seb. Bach, and Zacharias Hildebrand, organ-builder." It was the original intention of the authorities to place the Bach organ in the vestry of the renovated and enlarged Church of St. John, but it appears there is not sufficient room for it there. There should, one would think, be no lack of musical institutions, either in Germany or elsewhere, which would be glad to find both the money and the room for so interesting an historical relic.

The jubilee presentation to Mr. Alfred Gibson, to which we briefly referred in our last issue, included, in addition to the Broadwood pianoforte, a portrait of himself to be painted by M. Olivier, a music stand and baton, and a specially designed album, containing the autographs of the subscribers. Mr. John Farmer, a fellow townsman of Mr. Gibson's, in making the presentation, contributed some reminiscent and complimentary remarks, and Mr. Gibson feelingly replied in a few well-chosen words of appreciative gratitude. Mr. Gibson then conducted a performance by his own pupils (except the bass strings) of Handel's Concerto in G minor, in which the solo parts were played by Mr. Waldo Warner (first violin), Mr. Henry Gibson (second violin), and Mr. Paterson Parker (violoncello). Miss Fanny Davies and Madame Haas each contributed a pianoforte solo on the presentation instrument, and the taking of a photograph of the hero of the hour and his faithful fiddlers brought this pleasant function to a successful conclusion.

Mr. Andrew Deakin, the veteran musical critic of Birmingham, has in the press a valuable bibliographical work which should be of great interest to musicians, both professional and amateur.

The title of the book is:—

Outlines of Musical Bibliography: a catalogue of the music and musical works printed or otherwise produced in the British Isles. The whole chronologically arranged, with descriptive and critical notes on the principal works, by Andrew Deakin.

The proposed work, which is to be issued in three parts, will form an annotated bibliographical catalogue of about 10,000 early musical works. It will also include a "cross-reference catalogue, with compressed titles of all the works under the respective composers' names." As the subscription price for each part is only three shillings and sixpence, the immense labour that Mr. Deakin has bestowed upon his Bibliography should meet with its due reward.

A commemorative tablet has recently been unveiled at the house inhabited by Mendelssohn and his family, at Bad Soden, in the Taunus district, during the summers of 1844, 1846, and 1847. The composer of "Elijah," as his letters indicate, greatly enjoyed the "quiet life" in that delightful place. He composed much music at Soden, including his organ sonatas, and amongst a number of songs emanating from this period is the world-famed male-voice quartet "The Hunter's Farewell" ("Wer hat dich, du schöner Wald"). The admirable rendering of the latter, together with that of the scarcely less popular "The Merry Wayfarer" ("Wem Gott will rechte Gunst erweisen"), on the part of the united choirs of the Mittelrheinische Sängerbund (the promoters of the tablet), constituted the musical portion of the interesting ceremony, which also included an able discourse delivered by the worthy pastor of Soden, Herr A. Stahl.

Carl Reinecke attained the age of seventy-five on June 23. The event was celebrated at Leipzig by an interesting concert given at the Conservatorium, while a performance of the veteran's opera "Der Gouverneur von Tours" was given at the Stadt-Theater in honour of the occasion. Congratulations, none the less sincere though somewhat tardily expressed, to the distinguished musician upon this three-quarters of a century celebration. May the hand of time deal gently with Carl Reinecke.

Mr. T. B. Knott has resigned the appointment of Assistant to the Principal of the Royal Academy of Music, in order that he may be able to devote more time to his professorial work at the Academy and to private teaching. For thirteen years Mr. Knott has discharged the duties of a delicate and diplomatic post with rare tact and discretion—in fact, it may be said that he leaves it without having made an enemy. His withdrawal has, therefore, caused deep regret to all concerned—especially to Sir Alexander Mackenzie. No wonder that this regret has found expression in tangible form, which must be as gratifying to Mr. Knott as it is thoroughly deserved.

The marriage of Mr. Harry Plunket Greene, the well-known baritone, son of Mr. Richard J. Greene and the Hon. Louisa Greene, fourth daughter of Lord Plunket, and Miss Gwendolen Maud Parry, younger daughter of Sir Hubert Parry, Director of the Royal College of Music, and of Lady Maud Parry, sister of the fourteenth Earl of Pembroke, was celebrated at Highnam Church, near Gloucester, on the 20th ult. The wedding was a quiet one, the party walking to the church from Highnam Court, the residence of the bride's parents. Mr. Herman Herkomer was the best man, and amongst the company present were Miss Maude Valerie White and Mr. Leonard Borwick. Hearty congratulations to the newly wedded pair.

The monument erected over the grave of Hans von Bülow, in the Ohlsdorf churchyard, Hamburg, was unveiled, with due solemnities, on June 28, in the presence of his widow, the city dignitaries, and a number of friends and admirers of the distinguished artist. The monument is the work of the eminent sculptor, Professor Hildebrand, of Florence. It consists of a handsome block of Tyrolese marble, and bears a portrait in relief of the great pianist, with the simple inscription:—

geboren 8 Januar, 1830, gestorben den 12 Februar, 1894.

Albert Loeschhorn, the distinguished pianist and highly meritorious teacher, who is well known as the composer of pianoforte studies, entered upon his eighty-first year, in excellent health, on June 27. A number of his former pupils came specially to Berlin in order to be present at the banquet given in honour of the veteran artist on the occasion.

A Civil List Pension of £40 per annum has been granted to Mrs. Mary Ellen Robinson, "In consideration of the services rendered to music in Ireland by her late husband, Mr. Joseph Robinson."

The two Grands Prix de Rome of the Institute have been awarded this year to MM. Levadé and Malherbe, both pupils at the Paris Conservatoire of M. Massenet.

Sir George Martin has started for South Africa as Examiner of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. He will not return until October, and we are asked to state for the benefit of intending correspondents that no letters will be forwarded.

Dr. Frederick Niecks, Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh, will form the subject of the biographical article in our September issue.

FORTHCOMING FESTIVALS.

Three important Musical Festivals are to be held in different parts of England during the autumn—at Worcester, Norwich, and Sheffield.

The first, that of "the Meeting of the Three Choirs of Gloucester, Worcester, and Hereford," is also the senior, being at least 175 years old. It may not be without interest to compare the programme of the approaching "Meeting" with that (held at Gloucester) which took place one hundred years ago. Then all the performances, with the exception of "The Messiah," were miscellaneous! Madame Mara, the Albani of her day, received a fee of 140 guineas for her services as "the first female singer." The other vocalists were Mrs. Ashe, "a favourite singer at the Bath concerts"; Master Elliot, "a favourite soprano singer at the London concerts"; Harrison, Knyvett, "a most chaste counter-tenor singer"; Dangerfield, Griffiths, and Bartleman. "Mr. Cramer" led the band, and Mr. Hyde, a celebrated performer on the trumpet, appeared for the first time at the "Meeting." As the expenses were £1,154 7s. 3d. and the receipts £1,032 15s., there was a balance on the wrong side of £121 12s. 3d. The conductor, in the present sense of the term, is essentially a product of the present century.

The Norwich Festival in its present (Triennial) form dates from 1824, though from the year 1788 and onwards there were intermittent music-meetings of a Festival kind. The quality of the music as well as the inner workings of the Festival have improved since the days when Robert Lindley played a violoncello concerto while seated underneath an umbrella, which a kind friend held over him to keep "Bob" and his instrument dry! The reason for this outspread "additional accompaniment" was owing to the defective state of the roof of St. Andrew's Hall, whereby the rain literally damped the ardour of the orchestra. The name of Spohr is closely associated with the Norwich Festival. He was present at that held in 1839, when he conducted his oratorio "Calvary," the subject of which aroused the wrathful indignation of the clerical party in Norwich. Spohr, who knew not English, attended the service in the Cathedral on the Sunday preceding the Festival. In the course of the sermon, he repeatedly heard the title of his oratorio mentioned. Thinking that these references of the preacher could not be otherwise than complimentary, the composer very naturally assumed a "cheerful countenance"—in other words, his face beamed with smiles serene. But alas! what must have been his feelings when he afterwards discovered that the preacher had boldly declared his conviction that all those who listened to Spohr's "Calvary" would be "eternally damned"!

Sheffield, although by far the junior of this year's Festival family, shows a youthful vigour of great promise and an enterprise that will reap its due reward in the years to come. And then what a splendid heritage Sheffield has in those glorious Yorkshire voices! To hear such full-voiced singers is alone well worth a journey to the cutlery capital. We predict great things for Sheffield.

It may be convenient to our readers if, for the purposes of easy reference, we give in a tabulated form the skeleton programmes of the three Festivals above referred to, with their dates, names of the principal performers, &c. One or two features may first be specially mentioned. It will be observed that both "The Messiah" and the "Hymn of Praise" find a place in the schemes of all the three meetings. At Worcester a distinguished American musician, in the person of Mr. Horatio W. Parker, will make his début as a composer and conductor at an English Festival. The positions which Mr. Edward Elgar, Mr. Edward German, and Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor have already attained as composers are well maintained. In fact, the actual novelties are entirely their products. Mr. Elgar contributes for Norwich a new Cycle of Songs, composed expressly for Miss Clara Butt, who will sing them; Mr. Coleridge-Taylor, a new orchestral work (Worcester) and an Overture to his popular cantata "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast" (Norwich); and Mr. Edward German, a symphonic suite, entitled "The Seasons," of which the "Summer" number is a "Harvest Dance."

(*The works marked * will be conducted by their respective composers.*)

WORCESTER.

September 10, 12, 13, 14, and 15.

Sunday (Sept. 10), at 3.30.—Special opening service in the Cathedral. Anthems: "When Israel out of Egypt came" and "Hear my Prayer," Mendelssohn.

Friday.—Morning: *"King Saul," Hubert Parry.
Evening: Wagner selection; "Hymn of Praise," Mendelssohn.

PRINCIPAL VOCALISTS.

Mesdames Ella Russell, Marie Brema, Lilian Coomber, Alice Esty, Jessie King, and Clara Butt; Messrs. Edward Lloyd, Ben Davies, William Green, Andrew Black, Charles Knowles, and David Bispham.

Solo pianoforte—Mr. Frederick Dawson.
Chorusmaster—Dr. Henry Coward.
Conductor—Mr. August Manns.

LUTES AND GUITARS.

In looking recently through a catalogue of the Middle Temple Library my eye was caught by the title: "Discours non plus mélancoliques que divers de choses mesmement qui appartiennent à notre France: et à la fin La manière de bien et justement entoucher les Lucs et Guiternes." Poitiers. 1557. 4to.

This is an extremely rare book. M. Charles Nodier, in his memoir of Desperiers, states that only three copies are known to exist, and it may be that the Temple copy is the only one in England; certainly there is none in the British Museum or Bodleian Libraries.

The printer's name appears in the colophon: "Achevé d'imprimer à Poitiers le 13 de May, 1556, par Enguilbert de Marnef." The authorship has been much debated by the learned in France, and is now generally ascribed to several hands, among them probably those of Jacques Peletier and Elie Vinet.

The word "luc" in the title is an old and well-recognised form of "luth," and "entoucher" is the technical term for affixing the "touches" or frets on the neck of the instrument. These were generally eight in number, each representing the interval of a semitone, and in tablature they were indicated by the letters of the alphabet, a standing for the open string, b for the first semitone, and so on.

The rules here given for determining the exact position of the frets are not of any great scientific value. The author is innocent of ratios and commas: the semitones, he says, should be equal, and the ear is the best judge of whether they are so or not. More interesting is a passage in which he gives a rough classification of the musical instruments of the day in these words—freely translated from the original old French:—

> There are various kinds of musical instruments. Some are wind instruments, such as the trumpet and the organ; others are stringed instruments, such as the spinet and lute. Strings are either of metal, such as iron or brass, or of gut. The gut-stringed instruments now in use in France are the hurdy-gurdy, the rebec, the viol, the lute, and the guitar. Of these the three first are only adapted for playing a single part, but four parts (i.e., nearly all the music in the world) can be played on the guitar, and more than four on the lute, which is now made with six or even seven strings. In both the guitar and the lute all the strings except the highest are double.
> Thus the hurdy-gurdy is for the blind, the rebec and viol for minstrels, the lute and guitar for musicians, and especially the lute on account of its greater perfection.
> In my early days the lute was more used than the guitar, but in the last twelve or fifteen years everybody has taken to the guitar, and the lute has been almost forgotten; in fact, the guitar is much easier than the lute, and there is a peculiar charm in its tones.

The "Viele" was the hurdy-gurdy, and the "Rebec" an ancient and rude form of fiddle with three strings tuned in fifths. The "Guiterne," which our author says is called by some people "Guiterre" or "Quinterne," is the English "Gittern" or "Gyttron"—i.e., the Spanish flat-backed guitar with four strings, the three lower ones being double as in the lute. Mersenne, in 1636, describes it as having five strings tuned—or to corresponding intervals. In the six-stringed lute a G string was added above and below; any strings beyond six were, at least in the theorbo, bourdon strings without frets, attached to a separate neck and free of the body of the instrument.

The four-stringed lute at this date was tuned—

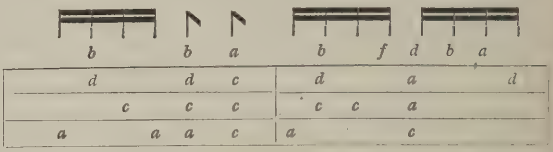
Music for the four-stringed lute is not often seen. The only example that I have come across is in one of the Stowe manuscripts in the British Museum. It is only a fragment, but must have been written about the time that the "Discours" were printed, for at the end of the same MS. is some music for the six-stringed lute headed: "The xviii^{e} daie of Maye the same writtin by one Raphe Bowle to learne to playe on his Lutte in anno 1558."

Here is the opening phrase of the tablature for the four-stringed instrument:—



J. F. R. Stainer.

MENDELSSOHN AND ROSENHAIN.

Jacob Rosenhain, born at Mannheim in 1813, was a pianist of some note in his day. He appeared at a London Philharmonic concert in 1837 (April 17), while seventeen years later a symphony of his was performed by the same Society (April 24, 1854). That symphony (F minor, Op. 43) had originally been produced at the Gewandhaus, under Mendelssohn's direction, in 1846, and this, apparently, is the only link connecting the two men, so far as biographies or dictionaries are concerned. From certain letters written to Mendelssohn by Rosenhain, copies of which have kindly been supplied to us by Mendelssohn's surviving daughter, Frau Wach, also from a letter written by Mendelssohn to Rosenhain, dated January 13, 1842 (a translation of which was published by the latter in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, November 18, 1877), we learn, however, that the two men were on a very friendly footing.

On August 24, 1839, Rosenhain writes to the composer to say how he is looking forward to spending a few days with him in Leipzig, and to making acquaintance, directly through him, with his new compositions. Mendelssohn had then only just returned to Leipzig (August 21) from Frankfort, where he had attended the wedding of his wife's sister Julie to Mr. Schunck, of Leipzig. A second letter from Rosenhain to the composer is dated Paris, December 26, 1841, in which he expresses his joy at perceiving how, from day to day, the reputation of his friend is increasing and spreading. He mentions that Habeneck will shortly perform the "Fingal's Cave" Overture,* also "St. Paul," "which is now being translated into French." And he adds that Habeneck would much like to have Mendelssohn's metronome marks for the different numbers, in order to give the work "as far as possible according to your ideas." Habeneck further desired to know whether Mendelssohn felt at all inclined to come to Paris and write an opera, in which case the great conductor offered to render all possible assistance. Rosenhain adds: "You have the power to undertake such a task; now show that you have the will." The production of the "Hymn of Praise" at Leipzig and Birmingham in 1840, the appointment of Director of the royal music at Berlin, and the production of "Antigone" at Potsdam (October 28, 1841) will sufficiently explain the references to the growing reputation of Mendelssohn.

In 1877 Rosenhain published in the Revue et Gazette Musicale, as mentioned above, the letter written to him by Mendelssohn. It is an answer to this second letter. After enquiries as to what Rosenhain was doing, and a reference to a Poeme pour piano, Op. 24, a composition of the pianist's which he had sent to Mendelssohn, the latter writes:—

"What you say concerning my works and their performance at Paris has greatly interested me; for your news accept my best thanks. I fear, however, they will not meet with much success. If in continuing in the path which I have followed, I succeed later on in composing better and more characteristic (ausgeprägt) works, then I might venture to hope that one or other of these compositions would make its way in Paris; but as to what I have hitherto done, I have my doubts; these compositions do not as yet differ much from what is produced there. You may, however, feel sure that it will afford me great pleasure, and that I shall esteem it a great honour, if anything of mine is given at Paris, and, especially, if a man like Habeneck interests himself in it. Please say many, many kind things to him from me. Formerly I was much attached to him, and already at that time he was so kind and considerate, that ever since I have thought of him, not only with respect and admiration, but also with true thankfulness. Please tell him that, and give him my best and heartfelt compliments."

Mendelssohn, in his letter, suggests that his "Fingal's Cave" Overture should be given, and also that Habeneck should try over his four, or at any rate three overtures, so as to select the one best suited to the artists of the orchestra. And he adds: "Tell me if he accedes to my request. In that case please correct a misprint in the score and parts of the Meeresstille (Calme de la mer). The allegro should have the time signature 𝄵, instead of 𝄴; the movement is very rapid; a half-bar is about equal to a crotchet in the finale of Beethoven's Symphony in A." His reference to the proposed opera is interesting: "You want me to write an opera for Paris! You know how I long to have a libretto from Scribe; you know that for years I have been ardently searching for a genuinely beautiful, dramatic subject. But to make my début at Paris with a first work of this kind presents so many difficulties, that I can only entertain the idea after I have had one or two operas performed in Germany, and unfortunately there is as yet no prospect of a good plot, or a good libretto. But thank also Habeneck for his goodwill in the matter, and if by chance he should know of any good, beautiful subject, beg him, for heaven's sake, to tell me of it. I should consider that, the greatest service which could be rendered to me in my artistic career."

The reference to Scribe is curious. A few years later Mendelssohn was in communication with Scribe with regard to an opera to be founded on "The Tempest" for Mr. Lumley, lessee of Her Majesty's Theatre. The libretto was written, but Mendelssohn was dissatisfied with it. It was set to music by Halévy, and produced, but without success, at Her Majesty's in 1850.

Rosenhain answered Mendelssohn on January 25 (the third letter communicated by Frau Wach). He relates how he translated his friend's letter to Habeneck (and he published it also in French, as may be seen by the word "ausgeprägt" in parenthesis in one of the above extracts). Habeneck promised to try over three overtures, and to correct the misprint in the "Meeresstille." He also tells Mendelssohn that his wish for a good libretto is likely soon to be realised, since he believes that Scribe is quite willing to furnish one.

Sir George Grove mentions Mendelssohn's love for billiards, and of this we find a trace in these letters. Mendelssohn asks Rosenhain if he remembers a conversation they had when walking back from Gohlitz to Leipzig. Rosenhain replies: "Yes, I do remember our walk to Gohlitz, and the musical conversation on the return journey after the great billiard match."

COSTA AS A HUMORIST.

Old oratorio goers and Festival frequenters will remember the late Sir Michael Costa as a man of imperious mien and dignified demeanour, whose countenance betrayed no sign of any inward humour. But even a nature externally so stern could unbend. The following letter from Costa to the late William Bartholomew furnishes evidence of unsuspected drollery in the great conductor. Beyond stating that "Barty" was the librettist of Costa's two oratorios, "Eli" and "Naaman," and that the reference is in all probability to a song in the latter work, Costa's comical Christmas-eve communication may speak for itself:—

7, Marine Parade,
Folkestone,
December 24, 1862.

I say Barty! what the Dikens (sic) you mean by telling me that you write like a Christian? Do you mean to say that I compose like a Turk? What I know is, that I am a very good Christian, and you are the greatest Turk [that] ever lived: blow me! if I think the contrary. If I suggested to finish the song with other words, the reason was simply this—with the exclamation "God! comfort—save us from dismay," the Finale of the song would be interrupted. And, if I succeed with the music, it will scarcely be heard out of a public performance and be excluded from the drawing-room—ex. gra. the two prayers in our former oratorio "Eli." The Morning Prayer has been sold and sells 60 times more than the Evening Prayer, though the public like the tune of the E. P. better than the M. P. Why? Because [it] concludes satisfactory for their ears. The other, though 50 times more effective for the situation in a public performance, does not sell so well.

* This was actually done within a fortnight of the receipt of Mendelssohn's letter, when the "Fingal's Cave" Overture was performed at the Conservatoire, on February 20, 1842, and, moreover, it was repeated on March 27. Habeneck appears to have been genuinely interested, for the symphonies followed, and on January 9, 1848, there was an In Memoriam concert, devoted entirely to Mendelssohn's music. The programme included the "Scotch" Symphony, the Violin Concerto, the "Fingal's Cave" Overture, and selections from "St. Paul."

That was my only reason for asking your "highness" to alter the last line. But as you, Sir, have most grossly insulted me, I shall set to music the former one, and will not, on any account, accept anything else. And in allowing you to prove to the public that you write not like a Turk, but as a Christian, I shall prove to the world that I compose not only like a good Christian, but as an Angel!!!!

Your most humble and very obedient servant,
MIKE.

SIR G. A. MACFARREN ON THE MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM OVERTURE.

From the far off Antipodes there comes the following enquiry of a correspondent:—

> "On which part of the play 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' is the Overture founded; and is there an imitation of the donkey's bray in it?"

We cannot do better than answer this question by quoting from an analysis of the overture by the late Sir G. A. Macfarren, expressed in language as felicitous and poetic as is the music itself:—

The "Wood near Athens" is a fairydom which Mendelssohn inherited direct from Shakespeare. The succession of thought may be as swift as thought itself; elfin chronicles may measure centuries as moments; and so, being the first artist that could claim the heirloom, he stepped into the domain of imagery just as it had been left, in which he proved his right by his mastery.

The four magical chords with which the Overture opens are the boundary between the real and the ideal, and on passing them the hearer finds himself in a new world, compounded of the elements that "dreams are made of." The device of assigning four parts to the violins gives airy colouring to the sprightly beings that people the realm; and the one pizzicato note for the violas that marks the repetition of the first strain is like a trick of Puck, that might scatter a shower of diamonds by a shaking of a rosebush. The tiny folk seem to scent the morning air, and to break, therefore, from their revel, just where Mendelssohn remembered Mozart—could he have thought of anything so sweet, or an alternative so fit for the broken sports? The passage is strange in the full forte where the wind instruments descend by seconds, each set entering two notes later than its forerunner, and the lowest proceeding in fourths, with one above it; the point is admirable with which they successively enter, and as to what is strange in their progression, he is to be pitied who can check the current of his delight to make objection thereto.

All the love of Lysander and Hermia is concentrated in the delicious melody that initiates the second subject; it is a very "love in idleness" to work a spell on each of us that hears it, and make him love the next thing that he looks on. This, perhaps, is why we are so pleased with Bottom's translation, and the rich humour that presents him to our ears in the exact shape in which he enraptured the fairy queen. Then we have the duke and his Amazon bride at their hunting, with the invigoration of the fresh air, and the manly exercise, and the clang of the music of the chase, and the brightness of daybreak.

The author's boundless invention has given a new aspect to the first fairy theme by the descending scale of pizzicato notes that accompanies many of its bewitching evolutions in the second part. How stilly is the repose where everything seems to sink to sleep under the potency of the magic flower, we may surmise—and the throbbings of the vexed heart cease to be painful; and how beautifully does the sustained sound of the lowest notes of the viola conduce to this effect of perfect rest. A happier conceit never took shape from the will of a poet, a master, a creator, than where the subject in quavers recurs the low G is given to the ophicleide—Bottom himself in the lap of Titania—a note which he must have foreboded who invented this instrument, the uncompoundable tone of which is the only one that can embody all its meaning; thanks for the invention, though it were never else applied.

At last the mesmerist waves his hand, the four magical chords of the opening are repeated, the boundary is passed, the spell is broken, and one asks forgiveness for what absurd vagaries one may have uttered during the dream—which has been but talking in one's sleep.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Although the fifth annual report of the Church Orchestral Society revealed some of the difficulties this useful body must inevitably, in its initial stages, pass through, it is evident that the work of the Society is becoming more clearly defined and that its position is already a strong one. In proof of this it is only necessary to quote a few words from the fifth report read at the general meeting on the 11th ult.: "Since the formation of the Society in 1894 a large number of amateurs have joined us, and dropped off. It seems that they are unable to stand the regular weekly practice which the committee have decided is the only way to secure tolerable and decent performance of divine worship." Again: "The committee feel that in upholding a high standard they are working in the true interests of both the Church and the Society." The courageous action and sensible words of the committee in this connection will command public respect and surely bring about good results. Another eminently practical feature of the Society's scheme is the arrangement whereby any number of competent players may be secured to fill up the ranks of orchestras undertaking Church work. This is an admirable and far reaching plan, which will tend to make the Church Orchestral Society a widespread power in the realms of sacred art. That such an association may prosper must be the earnest wish of all anxious to see the influence of the Church extended, and its art treasures made more generally available for the highest of all purposes, the public worship of "the Giver of all good gifts."

The music performed at St. John's Church, Duncan Terrace, Islington, has maintained a position commanding respect ever since the days when Canon Oakeley did much to preserve and develop the music of the Latin Church schools. The masses and other works recently sung there have included specimens by Palestrina, Vittoria, Carissimi, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, Hummel, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, &c. Orchestral accompaniments have long and consistently characterised the musical arrangements of this church; and it has been for some time the rule to perform pieces from the classical symphonies, save, of course, in Advent and Lent, as Postludes upon those occasions when the orchestra is employed.

In these days it seems more natural to expect from Hong Kong news of perplexing political problems than evidences of the advance of Church music. All the same, welcome news of special choral services come to hand from time to time, and the scheme of one such service at St. John's Cathedral, in the city of tea and opium, includes Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus," and Sullivan's "O gladsome Light," from "The Golden Legend," given with Mr. G. Grimble as organist and Mr. A. G. Ward as conductor. From Sydney, N.S.W., and other remote places similar tidings of the welcome development of the Church musical service are to hand.

By the formation of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, an important power has been created whereby the Church music of the diocese may be improved and further developed. Its chief objects are thus briefly and definitely stated: (1) To promote the study and practice of standard Church music; (2) to hold combined Church Choir Festivals in St. George's Hall. Amongst those who have signified their approval are the Bishop and the Lord Mayor of Liverpool, together with the leading clergy and musicians of the great maritime city. The originator of the scheme and hon. secretary is Mr. Ralph H. Baker. At the initial meeting the question "What is Standard Church Music?" was not unnaturally asked, and this question will remain one of the most serious of the difficulties to be encountered by the new Association. It is to be hoped the only safe practical reply will be given, by the adoption of a broad course in the recognition of all fine Church music of all schools and all ages, with special attention, however, to the cultivation of music composed during the past four centuries for use in the English Church. At the same time, care and judgment must be exercised in the way of seeking to make all interested in the work of the Association practically acquainted with every form of sacred music, from the simple chant to the elaborate oratorio, which has quickened the spiritual life of the Church through the long ages that have passed during which "our salvation has been made known to us."

At a special musical service held in the Horbury Congregational Church, Notting Hill, on the 9th ult., Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm was sung, under the direction of Mr. C. Thornton Turner. The choir festival at Middleton Parish Church, during the past month, was specially marked by a rendering of Dr. J. Varley Roberts's anthem "Seek ye the Lord," at the morning service. In the afternoon and evening the music was also of marked interest, consisting of anthems, an Evening Service in F, and various organ pieces from the pen of Dr. Henry Hiles, who directed the choral works. The organist was Mr. James Slater. A choral festival, at which worthy English music is honoured after this manner, is an occasion which offers a pattern deserving extensive imitation.

Invitations are being sent to sundry well-known organ players to give recitals at the Royal Albert Hall before the evening meetings of the Church Congress, from Monday, October 9, to Saturday, October 14. Imposing choral services are also to be held in St. Paul's Cathedral and Westminster Abbey during the same week. The special service in the Nave of Westminster Abbey, on October 11, at 7.30, will be the most interesting of all attempts to deal in a practical way with the great subject of Church music yet made in connection with the Church Congress meetings. Upon this occasion works illustrating the labours of English Church composers of the 16th, 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries will be given by the Abbey choir, under the direction of the organist, Sir Frederick Bridge. At the same time, by permission of the Dean of Westminster, Church music will be dealt with under the heads: Essentials of sacred music, Choice of music in choral services, Congregational music, and the training of choirmasters. Such a scheme should effectually silence the criticism of those who have long pleaded for a more complete consideration at the hands of the Church Congress authorities of the music of the sanctuary.

The death took place, on the 7th ult., at her residence in Tavistock Square, of Lady Simon, widow of the late Sir John Simon, at the age of seventy-seven years. Lady Simon, who was much beloved in the Jewish community for her saintly life and attractive social qualities, was a sister of the veteran Mr. Charles Salaman, well-known in musical circles, for whom much sympathy will be felt.

ORGAN MUSIC.

A spirited effort is being made to secure for Brisbane the fine organ built by Messrs Henry Willis and Sons, of London, for the Exhibition held in that city some eight or nine years ago, at a cost of something between £4,000 and £5,000. In connection with this important movement Mr. George Sampson has been giving a number of interesting organ recitals, twelve performances having taken place with this object. Features of the first six recitals were the first six Organ Concertos by Handel. Similarly the programmes of the recitals from seven to twelve inclusive were marked by the skilful rendering by Mr. Sampson of Mendelssohn's Sonatas in their printed order. The other pieces included organ works by the chief writers for the instrument, from the time of J. S. Bach to the present day.

Mr. Felix Corbett has signalised his election as the Borough organist of Middlesbrough by a series of organ recitals, the first of which was attended by the Mayor and Corporation. The programmes have been well varied, and properly marked by the performance of sundry classical pieces originally composed for the instrument.

Recently, Mr. R. E. Parker played a selection at Wilmslow Parish Church, his programme including Fantasia in C minor (Hoyte) and Intermezzo in F (Tours). At St. John's, New Clee, on the 16th ult., Mr. A. J. Lancashire gave a recital which included Merkel's Adagio in E major. The scheme of Mr. A. E. Chapman's recital, at St. John's, Bridgetown, Totnes, included Fantasia (Op. 40), P. Tietz. Recent programmes of Mr. Roger Ascham's recitals, at Port Elizabeth, included pieces by the English composers Smart, Sterndale Bennett, Bache, Wolstenholme, and Hollins.

At a series of recitals given at St. John's Cathedral, Hong Kong, by Mr. A. G. Ward, the programmes included various well known organ pieces of the German, French, and English schools. Mr. H. G. Archer gave a recital early last month at St. Dunstan's Church, Liverpool. His programme was arranged on familiar lines, and consisted to a large extent of good specimens of modern French organ music. Mr. G. Leake gave a recital at St. Mark's, Southampton, on the 10th ult., when the chief feature of an excellent programme was Rheinberger's fine Sonata in A minor (Op. 98). In connection with the Tonic Sol-fa Choir Festival, recently held at the Crystal Palace, Mr. Mowbray P. Balme gave an organ recital, the scheme of which included F. E. Bache's Andante and Allegro in D and Guilmant's Finale in E flat. The Sydney Daily Telegraph reports a performance given by M. Wiegand, at the Sydney Town Hall, the scheme of which included Kumstedt's "Eroica" Sonata.

Messrs. Morgan and Smith, of Brighton, are sending to Christ Church, Simla, India, a new two-manual organ. The scheme is a sensible one, illustrating the fact that our organ-builders are gradually fixing standards, as regards the character and proportion of the stops, that are acceptable alike to composers of organ music and to players on the instrument.

Mr. Wolstenholme gave a recital, on the 13th ult., at the Baptist Church, Blackburn. His programme included Rheinberger's Sonata in E flat minor, the Allegro Cantabile and Toccata (Widor's Fifth Organ Symphony), and his own pieces "Le Carillon" and Scherzo in F.

The fine new organ built by Messrs. H. Willis and Sons for All Saints' Church, Hertford, was opened recently by Mr. Malcolm Haywood.

SIR JOHN STAINER AND THE DEAN AND CHAPTER OF ST. PAUL'S.

An interesting gathering took place at the Chapter House, St. Paul's Cathedral, on the evening of the 12th ult., when the Dean and Chapter entertained Sir John Stainer at dinner, to celebrate the fiftieth anniversary of his admission as a chorister of that Cathedral. The entertainment was in the nature of a family gathering, and intended to emphasise the affectionate appreciation of those specially connected with the Cathedral for the invaluable work done there at the time when the old gave place to the new; when Sir John's unique personality and unsurpassed abilities not only brought about a transformation in the greater efficiency of the choral work, but also effected a revolution in the very conception of what church music may effect, in the promotion and fitting adornment of Christian worship—a revolution the influence of which it is not too much to say has been as widespread as that of the English Church itself throughout the world.

The Dean presided, supported by Canon Scott Holland and the Archdeacon of London—Mr. Otto Goldschmidt and Sir Frederick Bridge being their guests—together with those members of the College of Minor Canons and of the choir who had been associated with Sir John Stainer at St. Paul's. The speeches were strictly limited to the object of the meeting; consisting, after the usual royal toast, of the health of the visitor, proposed by the Dean; the visitor's response; and a graceful extension of the theme by Sir George Martin, which was insisted upon by the company.

The Dean's speech gave an interesting retrospect of his experiences at St. Paul's, illustrated by his reminiscences, and showing how completely the entire confidence of the Dean and Chapter had been justified by results. Sir John had found a choir weak in numbers, weaker still in lack of discipline; he had advised its enlargement to the present strength of eighteen men and thirty to thirty-five efficient boys, and, having secured his forces, he had worked them into a choir which, for efficiency and enthusiasm, a musician of European fame had declared was not to be excelled in Europe.

Sir John, in his reply, began with characteristic modesty by stating that he could have done nothing at all but for the complete loyalty and confidence with which the Dean and Chapter had accepted and helped him to carry out every single suggestion he had ever had to make. Then followed, at the urgent wish of his hearers, a little epitome of his musical career, from the day which was being commemorated, when, after a year's probation, he became a full chorister; his organistship at St. Benet's, Paul's Wharf; his work under Sir Frederick Ouseley at Tenbury; his election at the age of nineteen to the important post of organist of Magdalen College, Oxford; this leading, in 1872, to his appointment to succeed Sir John Goss at St. Paul's Cathedral. Of his experiences in his early days at St. Paul's he cited many amusing instances. Tradition and Toryism were evidently powers in the choir. Most of the music, and all that the choir liked best, was in manuscript and full of errors; but no one even dreamt of correcting them—in fact, they formed the source of recurrent arguments and interesting discussions which never seemed to lose the freshness of absolute novelty at each discovery. One gentleman in particular he cited who, on coming across a misprint in an anthem in a second tenor part, always sang the discord written in the text, and as invariably, having sung it, slapped his book and shut it up, and then sat down with the words: "There's something wrong there." If, he said, his experience in Magdalen had been valuable in training him in dealing with men and boys, scarcely less useful did he find his having served his apprenticeship as a choir boy in the Cathedral so long before. Thus when some respected senior member of the choir suggested at rehearsal that the tempo was not the traditional one at St. Paul's, his retort would be unanswerable: "On the contrary, I was at St. Paul's for years before you came, and this was the tempo."

In a speech which delighted his hearers, certainly not the least interesting portion was that in which he spoke of his first meeting with the present organist, Sir George Martin, his successor at St. Paul's, who used to ride in for lessons from a village twenty miles away, and whom he at once recognised as one on whom the hand of genius rested. The satisfaction he expressed at having first of all secured Sir George as his assistant and at having him as successor was cordially endorsed by all who were present. Incidentally Sir John made reference to the important subject of the selection of music, deprecating the condemnation which is so often heard of the proportion of new music to old. The controversy, of course, will not be settled with a word; but, as he remarked, people often forget that much of the old church music was written for the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and to all intents and purposes is chamber music, and on this account quite unsuited for services often attended by two or three thousand people or more. At the same time he expressed a hope that nothing of narrowness in the range of choice would ever show itself in the music of the Cathedral, but that as heretofore it would continue to afford examples of all that is good in every school. In conclusion, he expressed a very generous appreciation of the present standard of the choir and asserted that nothing pleased him more than the assurance from time to time that it was better than ever.

Sir George Martin, who was then called upon, but declined entirely to be led away from the subject of the evening into talking about himself, then gave more memories of his early associations with Sir John, especially filling in the background of his student days with touches of character which Sir John himself had naturally left vacant. Altogether the occasion was as agreeable as it was memorable: exactly the right people spoke, and what was said was just what the company wished to hear.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The sixteenth annual general meeting of the Royal College of Music was held on the 3rd ult., at Marlborough House, H.R.H. the Prince of Wales, President, in the chair.

Among the members of the Corporation and the Council present were: Prince Christian, the Earl of Pembroke and Montgomery, the Earl of Leven and Melville, Lord Farquhar, Colonel Hon. C. G. C. Eliot, the Hon. G. W. Spencer Lyttelton, the Hon. C. Stuart Wortley, Sir G. H. Chambers, Sir W. J. Richmond Cotton, Sir J. Whittaker Ellis, Sir E. W. Hamilton, Sir E. Durning Lawrence, Sir John Stainer, Sir C. L. Ryan, Sir Hubert Parry (director), Mr. Charles Morley, M.P. (hon. secretary), and Mr. J. W. Sidebotham, M.P.

Mr. Charles Morley, M.P. (hon. secretary), read the annual report, which stated that the number of pupils on the register at the close of the college year was 390—viz., 67 scholars and exhibitioners, receiving free musical education, and 323 students or paying pupils. Nine free open scholarships became vacant in March last, and preliminary examinations were held at 83 centres throughout the United Kingdom. The total number of candidates applying was 340, of whom 103 attended the final examination at the College. The College year had been marked by great musical activity, no less than 22 concerts having been given. The designs for the new concert hall had been approved, and when completed, which would be in about eighteen months, it should add largely to the prosperity and completeness of the College.

The Prince of Wales said: "It is now my duty, as on former occasions, to move: 'That the report be received and adopted.' You will, I am sure, have heard it read with great satisfaction. We deeply regret the loss of the Earl of Lathom, Lord Herschell, and Baron Ferdinand de Rothschild, who took great interest in the welfare of this Institution. We are glad, however, to think we have acquired the services of Lord Pembroke, Lord Leven, and Mr. Herbert Gladstone, who will be of much assistance to us. It is most satisfactory that, in memory of our late friend, Lord Charles Bruce, his widow has given so handsome a donation as £2,500 to found a scholarship in the College. I must call attention to the paragraph with regard to the concerts, and also to the operas which have been performed, and I think the director, Sir Hubert Parry, has every reason to be congratulated on their success. do not think there is anything else to mention with regard to the report, except as to the new concert hall, which will be a most valuable addition."

The Prince of Wales presented the Hopkinson gold medal for pianoforte playing to Miss Florence Smith; the Challen gold medal for pianoforte playing to Miss Maud Gay; and the gold medal presented by Raja Sir Surendro Mohun Tagore, of Calcutta (in commemoration of the marriage of the Duke and Duchess of York), for the most generally deserving male pupil, to Mr. T. F. Dunhill.

A vote of thanks to His Royal Highness for presiding concluded the proceedings.

THE ASSOCIATED BOARD.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE tenth annual meeting of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music for local examinations in music was held at Marlborough House, on the 3rd ult. The Prince of Wales presided, accompanied by Prince Christian of Schleswig-Holstein. Mr. Thomas Threlfall, the chairman of the Board, read the report for 1899.

The Prince of Wales, in proposing the adoption of the report and balance sheet, congratulated the Board on the eminently highly satisfactory report, especially in connection with the colonial examinations.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie proposed a vote of thanks to His Royal Highness, the President. This was seconded by Sir Hubert Parry, and heartily agreed to.

His Royal Highness acknowledged the vote of thanks, and expressed his gratification at seeing the harmonious way in which the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music were working together, this being of the utmost importance for the welfare of music in general.

"ASSOCIATED" HUMOUR.

In the evening there took place at the Trocadero Restaurant the tenth annual dinner of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music for local examinations in music. Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal presided, and the company was a distinguished one.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie remarked that the College and the Academy rejoiced over the recognition that the Associated Board was gaining from all the leading educational institutions of standing and worth both at home and abroad. His accord with the Director of the Royal College would be complete if only Sir Hubert Parry would cease to undervalue the bagpipes. (Laughter.)

Sir Hubert Parry testified that the harmony of the two institutions was largely due to the unflagging zeal of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, as well as to those glimpses of humour which were so characteristic of a Scotchman. (Laughter.)

THE OPERA.

PUCCINI'S "LA BOHÈME."

THE first performance in England of the original version in Italian of Signor Puccini's four-act opera "La Bohème" was given on the 1st ult., at Covent Garden Theatre. It may be well to mention that this work was originally produced at the Teatro Regio, Torino, on February 1, 1896, and that an English version was produced at the Theatre Royal, Manchester, on April 22 of the following year, by the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company, who subsequently opened their London season with it at Covent Garden, on the following October 2. On pages 391 and 747 of THE MUSICAL TIMES volume for 1897 will be found detailed criticism of the opera. A rehearing of the music confirms the opinions then expressed, particularly of those in the following passage: "The work does not improve on further acquaintance, the slightness of its story becomes more apparent, and the obviousness of the efforts of the composer to secure effects stands out with increased clearness. Moreover, the music is no less essentially Italian in idiom than the subject is peculiarly French, and consequently there arises a sense of artificiality and endeavour where there should be perfect union. Only in the love duets between Mimi and Rudolph can the composer be said to be entirely successful. The music in these scenes, however, charms by its delicacy and refinement rather than by its depth of sentiment. Great ingenuity is shown in the ensembles, and that at the end of the second act is remarkably clever."

On the 1st ult. Madame Melba appeared as the consumptive heroine, Mimi, and sang with great sympathetic charm; Mdlle. Zelie de Lussan gave a vivacious embodiment of Musetta, and the parts of Rodolfo and Marcello were excellently sustained by Signor De Lucia and Signor Ancona respectively. MM. Gillibert, Journet, and Dufriche completed a well found cast, and the vocal ensembles and orchestral portions were admirably rendered under the direction of Signor Mancinelli.

ADOLPHE ADAM'S "LE CHÂLET."

Consequent on a command of the Queen for the revival of Adolphe Adam's one-act opéra comique "Le Châlet" for performance on the 4th ult., at Windsor Castle—together with Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci"—the melodious and pleasing little work of the French composer was mounted on the 8th ult. at Covent Garden. It was originally produced in Paris in 1834, and an English version, under the name of "The Swiss Cottage," subsequently enjoyed considerable popularity in this country. The libretto, by Scribe and Melesville, tells a simple pastoral story in humorous fashion, and although the music is cast in a form which is somewhat tiresome to modern ears, it is so melodious and bright that it still possesses much freshness. The vocal solos call for finished singers, who were forthcoming on the 8th ult. in Mdlle. Leclerc, M. Cazeneuve, and M. Plançon, the last-named singing the florid bass songs with consummate skill. M. Flon conducted.

MR. DE LARA'S "MESSALINE."

The only real novelty of the season, Mr. De Lara's four-act opera "Messaline," was, after several postponements consequent on the necessity for extra rehearsals, produced on the 13th ult., under the conductorship of M. Flon. This is the fourth opera Mr. De Lara has written, the others being "The Light of Asia," "Amy Robsart," and "Moïna." The advance he has made since the first and second of these is very strikingly shown in "Messaline." So much talent, cleverness, and dramatic instinct indeed are shown in his latest effort that, apart from all other considerations, it is to be regretted that he should have accepted a libretto from MM. Armand Silvestre and Eugène Morand that can only appeal to admirers of the décadent school, for it is obvious that music allied to an ignoble and sordid subject, if true to its illustrative purpose, must lack nobility and those qualities which distinguish truly great art works. Moreover, examination of the score would seem to indicate that Mr. De Lara's chief strength does not lie in the illustration of sensual passion. In Messaline's first love duet, the music put in the mouth of Harès, as the expression of a pure minded man, ring far more true than that which Messaline sings; and in the second love duet with his brother, Hélion, there is a want of sensuous charm and absence of climax which results in the spectator being unmoved. The same fault is observable in Messaline's songs. They neither fascinate nor charm, in spite of the occasional beauty of their themes. On the other hand, Harès's song of scorn at Messaline's mode of life, "Dors bien, Claude," admirably expresses the spirit of the text, and Myrrhon's light-hearted ditties, "La vie est un jardin de fleurs" and "Viens aimer," are charming in their daintiness and grace. In the last act, in which some healthy sentiment is discernible, and the situation genuinely tragic, the music rises to a higher level than it has hitherto gained. All of which would seem to suggest that if Mr. De Lara will exercise his undoubted talents on a libretto based on nobility of motive instead of sensual gratification, he will be able to achieve more than he has hitherto accomplished.

Orchestration plays such an important part in modern opera that a few lines are demanded concerning that of Messaline. Although a few themes are associated with certain characters and ideas in the work, they are used in the simplest form of suggestion. The most important, made so by its frequent recurrence, is one which may be termed Messaline's "desire" theme. It is merely a backward and forward chromatic scale passage, extending over a major third, but it well serves its purpose. A kind of fanfare represents Messaline's Imperial position, and effective use is made of Harès's love theme. There are some successful attempts at local colour—notably with regard to the light-hearted Myrrhon; but in its entirety the scoring lacks body, the inner parts are ill nourished, and this in a large measure accounts for the deficiency of sensuous charm in the love music.

Only praise is called for concerning the performance. The title-rôle was magnificently embodied by Madame Heglon, who created the part on the first production of the work on March 21 last, at Monte Carlo. Hélion, the gladiator, was no less forcibly personated by M. Alvarez, and MM. Renaud and Gillibert were respectively excellent exponents of Harès and Myrrhon. The choruses were sung with spirit, and the mounting, especially the gorgeous scene in the first act, reflected the greatest credit on the management.

The season was closed on the 24th ult., during which "Faust" had been mounted seven times; "Lohengrin," six; "Roméo," "Tannhäuser," and "Carmen," five; "Aïda," "Pagliacci," "La Bohème," and "Tristan," four; "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Die Walküre," "Don Giovianni," and "Messaline," three; "Die Meistersinger," "Der Fliegende Holländer," "Les Huguenots," "Lucia," and "Norma," twice; and "Fidelio," "Hero and Leander," "Rigoletto," and "Le Châlet," once each.

WAGNER-TSCHAÏKOWSKY CONCERT.

Mr. Robert Newman gave, on June 28, his 138th orchestral concert since August last, at the Queen's Hall, a significant witness of his enterprise and the rapid development of public taste for music of the highest class. The evening was opened with Tschaïkowsky's "Pathetic" Symphony in B minor, upon which, as rendered under Mr. Henry Wood's direction, it is quite unnecessary to comment. The excerpts from Wagner were the duet between Elsa and Ortrud, from the second act of "Lohengrin," sung by Miss Lillian Blauvelt and Miss Kirkby Lunn, and the entire first act from "Die Walküre," which was finely interpreted. Miss Helen Jaxon sang most sympathetically as Sieglinde, Mr. Ellison van Hoose's beautiful tenor voice was most advantageously heard in the music of Siegmund, of which part he showed himself to be an exponent of the first rank; and Herr Emil Senger, the possessor of a powerful bass voice, most effectively delivered the words of Hunding. The orchestral portion was magnificently played, the soft passages being rendered with fascinating delicacy, and the climaxes being worked up with pulse-stirring intensity and force.

LONDON CONCERTS AND RECITALS.

CONCERTS.

A few lines must suffice in which to record the last of the season's Richter concerts, on June 26, at St. James's Hall. The programme opened with Peter Cornelius's exhilarating Overture to "The Barber of Bagdad" and included Liszt's impressive Fifth Hungarian Rhapsody in E minor; Rienzi's Prayer, the songs "Träume" and "Der Engel," and the great love duet from "Die Walküre," by Wagner; and Beethoven's Fifth Symphony. Our readers know how such a programme is performed under Dr. Richter's direction, but even the most regular frequenter of these concerts cannot possibly have called to mind a greater performance of Beethoven's masterpiece than the Viennese conductor gave us on this occasion. It was worthy of "the greatest Symphony" ever written. Madame Ella Russell and Mr. Ben Davies were the vocalists.

Mr. Charles Williams's recently formed orchestra in connection with the Passmore Edwards Settlement, Bloomsbury, gave a performance, on June 23, at St. James's Hall, in aid of a fund for providing free concerts in poor districts. The orchestra, which was founded last year by Miss Audrey Chapman, largely consists of ladies, and has the Duchess of York for its patroness. A meritorious rendering of Beethoven's Fourth Symphony in B flat proved Mr. Williams to be an able and skilful conductor, and showed that this body of instrumentalists is calculated to bring enjoyment to many whose means and opportunities are limited. Pleasing features of the evening were the pianoforte playing of Mr. Leonard Borwick in Mozart's Concerto in A and the singing of Mr. Plunket Greene.

The music of "Beauty's Awakening," the masque performed at Guildhall by the Art-Workers' Guild, on June 27 and three following nights, was composed by Mr. Malcolm Lawson and Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch. The latter was responsible for the dainty strains, performed on ancient instruments, of a "Dance of Winds and Forest Leaves." Mr. Lawson's music, played by orchestral students of Trinity College, included some bright, unpretentious vocal pieces and a spirited processional march.

Miss Ethel Altemus showed much promise as a pianist at her concert at St. James's Hall, on June 26. She played solos by Chopin, Brahms, Schumann, Liszt, and others with care and judgment. Madame Breitner, a capable violinist, played Leclair's Saraband et Tambourin; Miss Lillian Blauvelt successfully sang an air from Verdi's "Vêpres Siciliennes," and Mr. Kennerley Rumford distinguished himself by an impressive delivery of four of Brahms's Biblical songs.

The Misses Nebriska, stated to be respectively fourteen and fifteen years of age, gave a concert on June 29, at St. James's Hall. Both these ladies possess voices of promise. That of Miss Lillian Nebriska, a sweet-toned soprano, is the most developed, and her rendering of songs of florid character showed it to be very flexible. Miss Marie Louise Nebriska's voice is of a contralto quality. It is to be hoped that neither will be sacrificed to premature training.

Miss Cecile Hartog, favourably known to some amateurs by her tasteful songs, gave a concert on June 30, at the Portman Rooms, at which a number of her compositions were effectively rendered by Mrs. Helen Trust, Mrs. Mary Davies, Mr. Gregory Hast, Mr. Lane Wilson, and other artists.

Mr. Edward le Jeune's concert, on the 4th ult., at the Steinway Hall, was distinguished by the introduction of two new musical instruments. These were a violin, for the resonant body of which had been substituted the bell-like mouth of a phonograph, and a small harmonium of limited compass, on which it was possible to glide in portamento fashion from one note to another; the tone of neither instrument, however, excited a desire to hear it again—that of the hybrid-looking violin in particular being coarse and exasperating in quality.

Mr. Jan Mulder imparted distinction to his concert on the 4th ult., at the Salle Erard, by introducing two new chamber works—a Pianoforte Trio in F (Op. 191) by Rheinberger and a String Quartet in A minor from his own pen. The most attractive portions of the former are the opening Moderato and the slow movement, an Adagio molto, both of which are expressive. The quartet is a work of distinct merit. The second movement, a theme with variations, is well written, and there is a sense of humour about the Allegretto scherzando which is very welcome. The executants of the trio were Mrs. Norman Salmond and Messrs. Henri Seiffert and Jan Mulder, by whom it was excellently rendered. The composer was assisted by Messrs. Seiffert, Alfred Greenberg, and Nestor Lejeune in the quartet.

Miss Beatrice Griffiths, an Australian pianist, with a powerful touch and considerable technical facility, gave a concert on the 6th ult., at the Salle Erard. Violin pieces, contributed by Miss Muriel Griffiths, were a feature of the evening, and Miss Bessie Griffiths lent efficient assistance in Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Trio in C minor.

Misses Beatrice Spencer, Norah Newport, Edith Wehner, and Gertrude Calvert (pupils of Madame Blanche Marchesi) united their talents at a concert at the Salle Erard, on the 10th ult. Miss Calvert, the contralto of the party, gave an expressive rendering of the air "Softly awakes my heart" ("Samson and Delilah"), and Miss Spencer evinced command of differing styles in the tasteful performance of an air from Mozart's "Il Re Pastore" and Michael Arne's "The lass with the delicate air." Miss Newport and Miss Wehner, the last-named doing full justice to Massenet's "Pensée d'Automne," also ably acquitted themselves. The vocal pieces were varied by instrumental contributions by the Chaigneau Trio.

Miss JANOTHA'S concert at Queen's Hall, on the 17th ult., though among the last of the season, was more interesting than many by which it had been preceded. An important feature was Bach's Concerto in D minor for three pianofortes, again played by Miss Janotha, Lady Randolph Churchill, and Mrs. Craigie, with an orchestra from the Royal College of Music, conducted by Sir Walter Parratt. The performance was thoroughly creditable to all concerned. Besides contributing some pianoforte solos, Miss Janotha opened the concert with Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, in which her companion was Miss Leonora Jackson. Madame Ella Russell did justice to Miss Janotha's "Ave Maria," and among others who appeared were the Sisters Ravogli, Mr. David Bispham, and Mr. Whitney Mockridge.

A number of pupils of the Royal Normal College for the Blind gave a concert at the Crystal Palace, on the 19th ult., in connection with the Festival of the Institution. Some ladies of the choir sang Wilbye's madrigal "The Nightingale" steadily, and equal success marked the rendering by the whole of the choralists (totalling over forty) of Benet's madrigal "All creatures now are merry-minded." In Mendelssohn's cantata "Saviour of sinners" and Liszt's "Chorus of Reapers" the Crystal Palace Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Manns, took part. The same instrumentalists also played the accompaniments of the second and third movements of Raff's Suite in E flat for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 200), the respective solo parts of which were spiritedly executed by Mr. Leonard Pegg and Mr. Horace Watling. Saint-Saëns's "Variations on a Theme from Beethoven," for two pianofortes, were played by the Misses Mabel Davis and Emily Lucas, and the last-named also gave the Introduction and Allegro of Guilmant's First Symphony for the organ.

The Royal Academy of Music students' chamber concert at St. James's Hall, on the 20th ult., provided a hearing for several compositions still in manuscript. The first movement of a sonata for violin and pianoforte, by Miss Marion White, proved a well-devised and interesting work, symmetrical in form and rich in expression. It was ably interpreted by Miss Marian Jay and the composer. Mr. Herbert Ivey was represented by settings of Tennyson's "A voice by the cedar tree," "Birds in the High Hall garden," and "I said to the lily," of which the second was the most distinctive. The two pianoforte sketches by Mr. Ernest Torrence, "Sorrowful reverie" and "Waltz," were slight productions rather deficient in character. Midway in the programme came a lengthy "Symphonie Spirituelle" for strings, by Asger Hamerik, performed by the Ensemble Class conducted by Mr. Emile Sauret.

Concerts have also been given at QUEEN'S (Small) HALL, by Miss Grace Ellis, on June 26; STEINWAY HALL, by Madame Minnie Shatel, on June 29; ST. JAMES'S HALL, by Miss Emogene Martiny, on the 10th ult.; KENSINGTON TOWN HALL, by the Misses Roden, on the 19th ult.

RECITALS.

Mr. CHARLES GROS, a one-armed pianist from Paris, gave a recital on June 26, at the Steinway Hall. He played with fluency and sympathetic touch a number of well-selected pieces, using only his left hand—the right arm appearing to be paralysed. Some music-lovers may remember the similar achievements of Mr. Willem Coenen, several of whose clever transcriptions for the left hand have been printed by Messrs. Novello.

Herr GEORG LIEBLING gave a pianoforte recital on June 27, at St. James's Hall, when he was heard to most advantage in some clever and showy pieces of his own.

Mr. CHARLES FOERSTER, who gave his first pianoforte recital on June 29, at the Salle Erard, is not so brilliant a pianist as some who have appeared this season; but in Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata, Chopin's Berceuse and Polonaise, and in Liszt's second "Hungarian" Rhapsody he showed himself a cultured and artistic player.

The Misses CERASOLI showed at their recital on the 1st ult., at St. James's Hall, that they are making satisfactory progress as pianists. They played duets with delightful unanimity, and in several solos showed a sympathetic and expressive style. Their most obvious fault at present is a tendency to hurry in rapid passages.

Mr. HUGO HEINZ'S postponed vocal recital was held on the 3rd ult., at the Salle Erard, and proved very enjoyable. His rendering of four songs of Brahms-like character by Mr. Walter Imboden was particularly good. Herr von Dulong also sang with charming refinement, and some clever violin playing was contributed by Mr. Kálmán Roth-Rónay, a Hungarian.

Madame STEINHAUER-MALLINSON, the possessor of a light mezzo-soprano voice, sang a good selection of songs with artistic taste, on the 3rd ult., at the Steinway Hall, and created a favourable impression.

Mr. HERBERT FRYER played with so much sympathy and skill at his pianoforte recital, on the 4th ult., that the future progress of this young pianist will be watched with interest. His programme included Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques and a good selection of pieces by Brahms and Chopin. An expressive "Lament" and a vivacious Scherzo Caprice of his own composition further increased the good impression made by his playing and of his abilities.

Miss LILLIAN BLAUVELT'S vocal recital, on the 4th ult., at the Queen's Hall, bore witness to the versatility and intellectuality of this artist no less than to the beauty of her voice and its high training. Her songs were selected from several epochs of musical history, extending from Pergolesi to Saint-Saëns, and were interpreted in a most finished manner. Miss Blauvelt was assisted by M. Ysaye, who gave magnificent renderings of the solo part of Vieuxtemps's Fourth Violin Concerto in D minor, Bach's famous Chaconne in the same key, and Beethoven's Romance in G. It may be mentioned that Miss Blauvelt was commanded to sing before the Queen, at Windsor Castle, on the 17th ult., when she sang "Sicilian Vespers," Verdi, and "Connais tu le pays" ("Mignon"), Thomas, accompanied by the Queen's Band, under the conductorship of Sir Walter Parratt.

Miss EDITH KILMINSTER, who gave a recital on the 8th ult., at the Salle Erard, is a pianist of decided promise. Her interpretation of Beethoven's "Waldstein" Sonata showed intelligence and taste, and her programme testified to commendable desire to avoid hackneyed pieces.

Recitals have also been given at STEINWAY HALL, by Madame Riss-Arbeau, on June 27; Mr. Rudolph Loman (second pianoforte recital), on the 6th ult.; and Miss Marion Gordon (vocal), on the 12th ult.; at the SALLE ERARD, by Signor Chiti (violin), on the 6th ult.

HOVINGHAM MUSICAL FESTIVAL.

THE Hovingham Festival is a sort of lusus naturæ in music, for it certainly must be reckoned an abnormal state of things that a mere village in a thoroughly rural district should be able to give performances of such works as the "Flying Dutchman," Stanford's "Te Deum," and Brahms's "Song of Destiny," that are complete in every detail, and, in their general impression, are thoroughly satisfying. This is what Canon Hudson, rector of the neighbouring parish of Gilling, accomplished at Hovingham on the 12th and 13th ult., with a success quite remarkable; though not surprising, in view of what has been done at the eight preceding festivals given under his direction. Still, it is doubtful whether the chorus, consisting of local singers, aided by a contingent from Leeds, trained by Mr. Benton, has ever shown such an unfailing familiarity with its task. The "Te Deum" was sung with the precision of clockwork, greatly to the satisfaction of the composer, who conducted a capital and spirited all-round performance. Mr. Plunket Greene was the only member of the original quartet, the other soloists being Miss Ethel Wood, Mrs. Burrell, and Mr. Thomas Thomas. All were efficient, but a word is due to Miss Wood, who made her first appearance at these festivals. She has a soprano voice of great volume, a style which, if capable of more finish, is musicianly, and an enthusiasm which is very refreshing, though at times it inclines one to wonder whether even so powerful a voice will bear the unsparing use she makes of it. Her capacity was even more strikingly manifested in Mendelssohn's "Infelice," in which she showed remarkable dramatic power.

The other important choral work was Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," of which the second and third acts were given. The combined efforts of band and chorus proved at times rather more sonorous than was pleasant to sensitive ear-drums; but if this was in part due to a lack of refinement in the performers, it was also attributable to the small size of the auditorium and its excessive resonance. Beyond this, there was little fault to be found. The dramatic fire and youthful energy of the music were reproduced with a fidelity one rarely finds in concert performances of the work, and the wisdom of its choice was more than vindicated. The spinning chorus went with delightful gaiety, and the sailors' choruses were sung with real enthusiasm. The principals, too, were well chosen. Mr. Andrew Black's reading of the title-rôle is well-known, and he was admirably seconded by Miss Eleanor Jones, whose performance of Senta's music gained through the familiarity acquired by taking part in the Royal College stage performance of the opera. Daland, whose huckstering spirit, thinly veiled under an affectation of cordiality, is so true to life, and so effective a foil to the romance of the hero and heroine, had an excellent representative in Mr. Francis Harford, who sang the music with obvious relish. Mrs. Burrell made the most of Mary's small part, and Mr. Thomas Thomas was an acceptable Erik, whose tiresome cavatinas form perhaps the weakest feature of the opera. The selection, which was preceded by a robust reading of the overture, was very ably conducted by Canon Hudson.

The other choral works were Brahms's "Song of Destiny" and a setting of a poem by Keats, "A Prophecy," by Mrs. Tom Taylor (Laura W. Barker), a Yorkshire lady, who for many years has been known as an amateur of far more than ordinary ability. The chorus was written as far back as 1850, but the orchestration was revised for this, its first performance. It is pleasant, tuneful music, and when it is remembered what average English music was half-a-century ago, it is evident that the composer was by no means behind her times. To our ears, it must be confessed, it lacks something in breadth, and does not satisfy our yearning for music that shall express more than the superficial meaning of the text. The composer was present and it must have been pleasant to her to at last hear her music, after so many years, and to find it prove so acceptable to the audience that it had to be repeated at the third and last of the three concerts of which the festival consisted.

There were several orchestral pieces, chief among them being the "Italian" Symphony of Mendelssohn, which proved the happiest effort of the band, and was played with remarkable clearness and spirit. The curiosity of the festival was a long-lost overture by Weber, written soon after he became conductor at Prague, as part of the celebrations which followed the defeat of Napoleon at the battle of Leipzig. A pure pièce d'occasion, it seems to have been put aside as soon as the occasion had passed, and Jähns, when accumulating material for his monumental "Catalogue," could find no trace of it. Quite recently, however, some parts have been found, and from them a Dresden amateur, Mr. Klemm, has constructed a score, which enabled "1813" to be introduced to England eighty-six years after it was, to use Weber's own word, "arranged." This word, by the way, points to the employment of existing material; but it is a singular fact that the main theme is that of the well known part-song "Lützow's Wildejagd," which Weber wrote (to Körner's words) just a year later. From this it would appear as if the song were a quotation from the overture, instead of the reverse being the case. The overture is a rather noisy, jubilant, and even rollicking piece, no more representative of Weber than was to be expected in a composition written almost "while you wait," so short was the notice allowed the composer. It would be a godsend to a military band.

There were two instrumental soloists. In place of Mr. Kruse, who was taken ill, Miss Norah Clench came at the eleventh hour and played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Bach's A minor Concerto, and Beethoven's Romance in G with genuinely artistic feeling and much technical ability. Mr. Carl Fuchs, of Manchester, was heard in the Andante of Molique's Violoncello Concerto, and in a less familiar concerto by Haydn, which he has recently been playing with deserved success. Among the vocal solos there must be mentioned a dramatic setting, by Dr. Charles Wood, of Walt Whitman's "Ethiopia saluting the colours," which well suited Mr. Plunket Greene's emotional style.

THE NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

This year's National Eisteddfod was opened at Cardiff, on Tuesday, the 18th ult., the meetings extending over the remainder of the week. Cathays Park, in which it was held, is a pleasant and central part of the town, recently acquired from the Marquis of Bute by the Corporation for municipal building purposes. The Eisteddfod pavilion, as usual specially built for the occasion, was a very well designed structure, impervious to rain and satisfactory as to sound, and capable of seating some 10,000 persons.

The leading attraction of the first day was the chief choral competition, in which £150 (with music to the value of £5 to the conductor, given by Messrs. Novello and Co.) and £50 were offered respectively as first and second prizes; a solatium of five guineas being also given to the conductor of each unsuccessful choir. The committee had taken rather a new departure in selecting Sir Hubert Parry's fine work "Blest Pair of Sirens" as the leading test piece, the other being Mendelssohn's "Why rage fiercely the heathen?" the latter to be sung unaccompanied; and considerable interest and curiosity was felt by Eisteddfodists as to the response that Welsh choirs would give to this, and the manner they would acquit themselves on somewhat unfamiliar ground. Suffice it for the present to say that the first prize was awarded to the Cardiff choir and the second to Carmarthen. Further particulars of this and subsequent events must be held over till next month.

THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

MR. HARRY FARJEON'S OPERA.

The Midsummer terminal performance by the students of the operatic class of the Royal Academy of Music took place on the 17th ult., at St. George's Hall. Exceptional interest pertained to this occasion owing to the production of a new opera in two acts, entitled "Floretta," by Mr. Harry Farjeon. This young musician, who is only twenty years of age, and who is the Goring Thomas Scholar at the Academy, has written several compositions, notably a Ballet Suite in A for orchestra, produced at the students' concert on July 21 last year, which have testified to his possession of a lively imagination and considerable power to give it expression. These qualities distinguish the music of "Floretta." Dramatically the young composer is weak, but Minette's song, "'Twas at the Fair of Nérac," is very bright and pleasing. The duets are expressive, and distinct promise is shown in the song "Gay butterfly" and in the heroine's farewell. Mr. Farjeon also handles the orchestra with much skill and shows a sense of variety of tone-colour which greatly adds to the effectiveness of the vocal parts.

The libretto, by Miss Eleanor Farjeon, is a very creditable book, considering that the writer is only eighteen years of age. The plot, based on a story by Heinrich Zschokke, is tersely unfolded, and the lyrics are neatly written. The principal female characters were admirably embodied by Ethel M. Wood, Julia Franks, and May George; and Whitworth Mitton, Ernest Torrence, and P. C. Suckling sustained the male parts with some ability.

The remainder of the evening was occupied by an amusing operetta in one act, entitled "The Noble Savage," written and composed by Mrs. H. and Mr. F. Corder, which some fifteen years ago enjoyed considerable popularity in the provinces. The little work contains several clever burlesques, in particular a sextet in the conventional style of old Italian opera, and much that is calculated to excite the esteem of musicians. Ethel Wood, Julia Franks, and Lillian Ginnett acted and sang with vivacity and point, and were well supported by Murray Rumsey, Philip Suckling, and Ernest Torrence, the last-named, admirably made up, personating the title-rôle with much humour.

The instrumental portion of both operas was effectively rendered by the student orchestra, and Mr. G. H. Betjemann conducted with his usual alertness and skill.

THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC CONCERT.

It never rains but it pours! Variations more or less learned and interesting on themes more or less original are just now being produced in unprecedented and alarming quantities, and it would really be a welcome change to have a little more "theme" and continuity, and a little less "varying" in some of the novelties upon which we are called to sit in judgment. At the final concert of the summer term, on the 18th ult., we were regaled with yet two more sets—viz., one for orchestra on the air "Old King Cole," by a student, Nicholas Gatty; and a second for violoncello solo and orchestra by Boëllmann. Mr. Gatty's work displays good workmanship, plenty of ingenuity, and some rather conventional humour. He certainly succeeded in causing us to make a mental note of his name so as to watch his future doings with interest and hope. R. Purcell Jones played the solo part in Boëllmann's variations extremely well; he is indeed a violoncellist of exceptional promise. In Schumann's most lovely Pianoforte Concerto, Florence Smith, a very youthful student, displayed a surprising amount of brilliancy, passion, and poetry, and if her physical strength was not quite equal to the great demands made upon it by the superb Finale, she may yet be credited with a most excellent achievement. Ivor Foster sang Handel's "Del minacciar del Vento" ("Ottone"). His well trained, ringing baritone, and manly and artistic style did full justice to the music. Agnes Nicholls, Gwilym Evans, and Madoc Davies were heard in Beethoven's trio "Tremate, empj, tremate," and the orchestra gave creditable performances of Schumann's "Genoveva" Overture and Mozart's "Jupiter" Symphony. But what is the matter with the College strings? they certainly do not display the same tone and technique as of yore!

TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

The high degree of efficiency attained by the members of the Tonic Sol-fa Association was conclusively demonstrated at the fifteenth annual festival, held at the Crystal Palace, on the 8th ult. Two concerts were given on the Handel orchestra. In the afternoon 5,000 certificated juvenile singers went through a programme consisting of Vincent Novello's sacred song "The Infant's Prayer," hymns, part-songs, and vocal marches, with considerable steadiness and spirit, under the direction of Mr. S. Filmer Rook, with Mr. C. H. Rowcliffe at the organ. Later in the day Mr. Leonard C. Venables conducted about 3,000 adult choralists, representing thirty London choirs and a number of distant districts—such as Glasgow, Leeds, Manchester, Sheffield, and Swansea. A small orchestra assisted, and the organist was Mr. Henry W. Weston. Selections from Costa's "Eli," Hatton's "Robin Hood," E. H. Nichol's "The Holy Grail," and Dr. H. Coward's part-song "The Best in Life" were very satisfactorily sung—the unanimity with regard to details of expression being remarkable for so large a body unaccustomed to singing together. The greatest proof of ability and readiness was, however, afforded by the sight-singing test. At a competition held last May at Cassel, Edwin Schultz's part-song "The Warrior and his Love" was sung by choirs after an hour's practice in private with the assistance of a pianoforte. It was distributed to the tonic sol-fa singers on the orchestra and sung without accompaniment immediately. There was no hesitation in attack or during the progress of the piece, and the entire performance was eminently praiseworthy.

BRAHMS MEMORIAL FESTIVAL IN MEININGEN.

Musical tourists in Germany will be glad to hear of an important musical festival which, in October next, will be held at Meiningen, on the occasion of the dedication of a statue to the memory and in honour of the late Johannes Brahms. The scheme of the proceedings—a very interesting one—stands as follows:—

On Saturday morning, October 7, at 9.30, Brahms's noble work, "A German Requiem," will be performed in the Town Church. This will be followed by a procession to the memorial, when speeches will be delivered, and the statue will be formally handed over to the town by the honorary president of the memorial committee, Dr. Joseph Joachim. On returning to the church at noon Brahms's "Triumphlied" will be performed. In the evening, at 7 p.m., an orchestral concert will be given in the Court Theatre, with a programme consisting exclusively of works by Brahms—viz., the "Tragic" Overture, the four "Serious Songs" (Dr. Kraus), the Concerto for pianoforte and orchestra (No. 2) in B flat (Eugene d'Albert), the Rhapsody for alto solo and male choir, and the Symphony (No. 2) in D.

On October 8, at 11.15 a.m., there will be a performance of chamber music by the Joachim Quartet in the Court Theatre, the programme of which includes a String Quartet in C major by Haydn, Brahms's Trio for clarinet, violoncello, and pianoforte, and Beethoven's Quartet in C sharp minor. In the evening Bach's cantata "Gleich wie der Regen und Schnee vom Himmel fällt," Beethoven's Violin Concerto (Dr. Joachim), and the Ninth Symphony will be performed in the Court Theatre.

On October 9, at 11 a.m., Mozart's String Quartet in G minor, a Quartet by Schumann, and Schubert's String Quintet will be heard at a second chamber music concert. In the evening there will be an orchestral concert, when the programme will include Schubert's Symphony in B minor (Unfinished), Mozart's Pianoforte Concerto in A major (Leonard Borwick), vocal pieces, Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, and his Symphony (No. 4) in E minor.

A festival performance of Beethoven's "Fidelio" is in view for October 10, and from October 6 to 10 a collection of portraits and busts of Brahms, with other interesting mementos of the master, will be on view. The whole festival will be under the direction of the general music-director, Fritz Steinbach, and seats for the six concerts may be obtained, at a cost of 25s., of the banker, B. M. Strupp, in Meiningen.

THE INTERNATIONAL CONGRESS OF WOMEN.

DISCUSSIONS ON MUSICAL EDUCATION.

The International Congress of Women held a nine days' session, from June 26 to the 1st ult., in Westminster Town Hall. The morning of the 1st ult. was devoted to the discussion of matters connected with musical education and proved to be of great interest to a large and important audience. The Countess of Bective presided, and in her opening remarks said that music was very important to women, and she observed it was easy to surmise that many of the folk-songs of the world were composed by women for women, and that hundreds of beautiful cradle songs and laments were the outcome of women's feelings. Mr. Henry Bird spoke of his early experiences, and gave some excellent advice as to the cultivation of the power of the art of playing accompaniments.

Miss Wakefield read an admirable paper on "Musical competitions, a means of musical education." She said the problem was how to arouse interest in music in people who do not want to trouble to learn. The appeal to the combative and competitive instinct may not be without objection, but in such cases it has been proved repeatedly that competitions have lured the unwilling to set about learning good music and so educated their taste and induced them in the end to like music for its own sake. The promotion of schemes of this sort in various parts of the country called for competent enthusiasts, and she was glad to say there are many such to be found who do not confine their enthusiasms to a daft worship of the Wagner god.

Mr. J. A. Fuller Maitland read an able paper on "Music as a profession for women." He commented on the paucity of women composers and he warned would-be professionals of the great arduousness of the task before them. Miss Palliser, Miss Elsie Fogerty, Miss Joachim, and Madame Antoinette Sterling all spoke upon voice production and the art of singing. Mrs. Kate Lee, the hon. sec. of the Folk-Song Society, gave a humorous account of the difficulties she experienced in collecting songs from country people.

Dr. McNaught read a paper on "Music in Women's Training Colleges." His remarks were confined to the colleges under State inspection. It was stated that there are in Great Britain forty-seven colleges in which there are women. In these colleges in 1898 there were 3,391 women students. The course of musical instruction was described, and the result, as tested at the annual examination by Sir John Stainer and himself, was declared to be highly satisfactory on the whole. The choral performances are frequently of a high order of excellence. So far as the schools of the country were concerned, Dr. McNaught believed that the ideal singing teacher for children is a woman possessing a beautiful voice and plenty of brains. The man's voice is in the wrong octave. The meeting was considered a highly successful one, and likely to bear fruit in many ways.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD.

CONCERT AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

A choir of 5,000 picked children performed at the Crystal Palace on June 30, the occasion being the annual distribution of prizes for Scripture knowledge. The performance was excellent in almost every respect, the only fault being the slowness of the tempi in some of the pieces. All the music sung had been arranged for children's voices without the support of tenors and basses. The tone was remarkably good; it was full, round, and well in tune. The balance of parts was also satisfactory. The programme included arrangements of "Strike the lyre" (Cooke), the march from "Tannhäuser," "I waited for the Lord" (Mendelssohn), and "The Skylark's Song" (Mendelssohn). A band of 250 junior performers selected from numerous schools contributed the accompaniments and played with excellent effect. Mr. A. L, Cowley conducted and Mr. F. S. Lyne was at the organ. In the evening a school operetta, "The Jewel of Fire," was performed in the theatre by a large company of children from the Haselrigge Road Higher Grade School. It was given under the direction of Mr. A. G. Gibbs and Mr. W. T. Stuart, who respectively wrote the words and composed the music. The operetta was well received by a large audience.

THE NATIONAL TEMPERANCE UNION.

THREE GREAT CONCERTS AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE.

The utility of music as a servant to popular causes has never been better illustrated than it was at the Crystal Palace on the 5th ult., when three choirs, each of 5,000 singers, performed in turn. It need scarcely be said that the programmes were mainly of a popular character, but they included some sterling music. The execution was generally good. It was evident that the music had been earnestly studied.

The first concert was given by a children's choir. Mr. G. W. Hardwidge conducted with vigour and success, although some of the pieces were taken at record quick pace.

The second choir was made up of provincial societies, In this choir the tone was exceptionally good, especially in the tenor and bass parts. The programme included "When winds breathe soft" (Webbe), a chorus "Spirit of Song" (L. H. Southard), an arrangement of "The Village Blacksmith" (Weiss), and an anthem by Mr. W. Riley, of Nottingham, who very ably conducted the whole concert.

The third concert was given by metropolitan singers, under the experienced conductorship of Mr. G. W. Williams. The mass of tone from this choir was not so impressive as it was from the provincial choirs, and the programme was hardly so good as that of the previous concert, but it seemed to give pleasure to a large audience. Choral competitions were held during the earlier part of the day. Adult choirs competed in two sections, with the result that in the principal section the Nottingham Tabernacle Choir, under Mr. W. Riley, came first, and in the other section the London Road Temperance Choral Society, under Mr. S. Martin, won the first prize. Dr. McNaught adjudicated. In the junior choir competition the first prize was taken by Mr. Haley's choir from North Shields.

CHILDREN AND CROTCHETS.

Many systems have been devised with commendable desire to help the young to master the signs of the staff notation, and amongst the most recent endeavours that of Miss Evelyn Ashton Fletcher certainly deserves attention. As set forth by Madame Isabel Wilson, at a lecture on the 18th ult., at St. James's Hall, it was proved by the answers of a class of little folks, from five to seven years of age, to excite their interest and convey to their minds in an entertaining form the desired information. It has a philosophical basis in appealing to the senses of touch, sight, and sound, and in affording children active employment. In the early stages they make the staff by stretching black tapes on a table and cut the notes and clefs in black card-board; the notes are invested with certain characteristics of dolls or soldiers, the duration of their sound is taught by the employment of pieces of wood of different lengths, the scales by the use of little ladders, and rhythm and other matters are explained by devices of similar ingenuity.

With a touch of humour and keen insight into human nature, Madame Wilson observed: "When those of older years seem to think these means two infantile for their age, I say this is how we teach the little ones, and then the system works just the same." Those who would know more of the method may be recommended to address Madame Wilson, care of Messrs. John Broadwood and Sons, Great Pulteney Street.

SCHOLARSHIPS AND PRIZES.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

The competition for the Robert Newman prize took place on June 24, when the prize was awarded to Leonard Hart, a native of London. The examiners were Messrs. H. L. Balfour, F. A. W. Docker, and Dr. Edward J. Hopkins. The competition for the Joseph Maas memorial prize took place on June 26, when the prize was awarded to Whitworth Mitton, a native of Manchester. The examiners were Messrs. William Green and Charles Lyall.

On the 4th ult. the Charlotte Walters prizes were awarded to Estella Maud Hawson, a native of Greenwich, and Lilla J. Hosking, of Newton Abbot, the examiners being Miss Bateman (Mrs. Crowe), and Messrs. William Farren, Henry Lesingham, Ian Robertson, and F. Corder. On the 8th ult. the Walter Macfarren gold medals were awarded to Marion I. H. White, a native of London, and Frederick G. H. Moore, of London, the examiners being Messrs. Carlo Albanesi, Oscar Beringer, Henry R. Eyers, Frits Hartvigson, Tobias Matthay, Adolph Schloesser, and Walter Macfarren.

The competition for the Swansea Eisteddfod and Parepa-Rosa prizes took place on the 10th ult., when the prizes were awarded as follows: Swansea Eisteddfod prize to Gertrude Drinkwater, a native of Cardiff; Parepa-Rosa prize to Eric Dudley, a native of Wigan. The examiners were Messrs. Bantock Pierpoint and H. Gregory Hast and Mrs. Mary Davies.

The Charles Lucas prize was awarded, on the 13th ult., to Harry Farjeon, a native of New Jersey, U.S.A. Messrs. S. Coleridge-Taylor, Percy Pitt, and Hamish MacCunn were the examiners.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

The following awards were made at the conclusion of the Midsummer Term :—

A Council Grant of £20, divided equally between Phœbe Parsons (singing), Harold Wilde (singing), and Patrick Black (organ); a Council Grant of £30, divided equally between Helen Egerton (violin), Edith Stapley (violin), and Edward Mason (violoncello); the London Musical Society's prize, value £3 3s., Kate Anderson (singing); the Brinsmead Pianoforte prize, Ethel Wilson; the Hill and Son Violin prize, Haydn Wood.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

The competition for the renewed Erard Centenary (1894) scholarship, of the value of £40 19s. per annum, was held at the Guildhall School of Music on the 3rd ult., when the examiners—Messrs. Benno Schonberger and Michael Hambourg—awarded the prize to Mabel Monteith. The scholarship, value £75 per annum, recently given by Baron Johann Knoop has been awarded to Joseph Schofield, aged thirteen, a native of Leeds.

TRINITY COLLEGE (LONDON).

The following candidates were successful at the examinations held in July for the Diploma of Associate in Music: H. D. Adler, T. W. Britton, Henry Cook, E. S. Deacon, W. E. Ellen, F. M. Gooch, Frank Langley, M. P. Lawrie, C. H. Lindow, H. E. Mackinlay, C. A. Mercer, M.A., E. L. Salamé, W. H. E. Spooner, John Wright, and G. Young.

REVIEWS.

Concert-Overture in C minor. By Alfred Hollins. No. 15 of the Recital Series of Original Compositions for the Organ, edited by Edwin H. Lemare.

Organ Arrangements, edited by George C. Martin. No. 53, Marche Funèbre (Op. 40, No. 3), by P. Tschaïkowsky, and No. 54, March in D minor, by Agnes Zimmermann.

Original Compositions for the Organ. No. 278. Meditation. For Violin and Organ. By Herbert Bunning.

Festival Times. Ten Short and Easy Pieces for the Harmonium or Organ. By Max Oesten (Op. 205).

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Alfred Hollins has succeeded in producing a bright and winsome recital piece. His overture opens with a slow introduction, containing a foreshadowing of the principal theme. The Allegro con brio starts off in this energetic manner:—

The impetuosity of this semiquaverously-inclined section is checked by the tranquil and melodious second subject, un poco più lento, con espress, in the orthodox relative major. The working-out starts off with opening bars of the main theme treated fugally, but only for a brief period, as the composer is evidently not fugally intent—in fact, his music soon suggests the skedaddling of a fugitive, gladly making his escape from the bonds of pedanticism, clad in the airy garb of staccato semiquavers. The principal subject duly returns and is followed by the second theme, this time, however, in the tonic (C) major and fortissimo, superimposed upon a pedal part in which the semiquaver passage of the Allegro is ingeniously introduced. The work is that of a highly-gifted musician. Moreover, as it presents no abnormal difficulties, its success seems almost a foregone conclusion.

Those who heard Sir Walter Parratt play Tschaïkowsky's Funeral March at the opening of the organ in Lincoln Cathedral, in November last, cannot fail to have been struck by its grandeur when played on the king of instruments. Therefore, an arrangement of its "dying strains" by so skilful an adaptor as Mr. Walter Alcock is sure to find a welcome. Miss Agnes Zimmermann's March in D minor, originally composed for the pianoforte, makes an effective organ piece. The arrangement is by Sir John Stainer. What more can be said?

The title, "Meditation," of Mr. Herbert Bunning's duet for violin and organ, might perhaps be open to objection, but has not a great Englishman said, "What's in a name"? Here the violin has a sweetness all its own, and the organ part—if, now and then, somewhat pianofortecally inclined—rises to the occasion, though in the hands of an unsympathetic player it might prove a thorn in the flesh to the violinist.

Mr. Max Oesten has, in his "Festival Times," written ten short pieces suitable to the great Church Festivals, with the addition of "New Year's Day" and a concluding "Thanksgiving." In all of these he shows a melodic gift and a suggestive appropriateness in the treatment of his various themes. Harmonium players will find these pieces well suited to the requirements of their instrument and, as the title suggests, they may be played on the organ, and—may we not add?—with acceptance.

Morris Dance. For the Pianoforte. By A. C. Mackenzie.

The Morris, or Morrice Dance, a very lively measure in four-time, is believed to owe its origin to the Morisco, a Moorish dance once popular in Spain and France. Many people have been familiarized with it, in the present day, through Mr. Edward German's incidental music to "Henry VIII.," in whose reign it was probably in its prime. A feature of it was the ornamentation of the dresses of the dancers with an endless number of regularly-attuned bells, sometimes as many as 250 having been used on one dress. This gives us an idea of the character of the dance, which is such as one would associate with a Kermesse or fair, with its accessories of penny shows and merry-go-rounds.

The example before us, written in G major, opens with a pompous introduction on the chromatic chord of the seventh on the minor sixth of the scale, whence, after six bars of waiting and wakening interest, the resolution into the tonic concord comes in as naturally as the rainbow after the sun-shower, and with somewhat the same effect. A simple melody, already indicated in the introduction, now follows, and we feel at once that we are launched upon a good old English "tune" of the good old style, yet worked out in so musicianly a manner that we are led along, through various hidden surprises of harmony, whither the composer wills, and not always where we thought we were going.

A second subject, in E minor, forms a pleasant contrast, and rightly maintains the simplicity so necessary to a work of this kind, where anything abstruse or deep would be as much out of place as a Sarah Bernhardt in a pantomime. But to say a simple thing simply, characteristically, and in accordance with the spirit of the period it represents takes a master-hand to do it, and this is the case with the piece before us, which will doubtless become a favourite, especially with those who like to recall a scene of "the good old days."

Handlung und Dichtung der Bühnenwerke Richard Wagners nach ihren Grundlagen in Sage und Geschichte dargestellt. Von Dr. Hermann Freiherrn von der Pfordten.

[Berlin: Trowitzsch and Sohn.]

Wagner literature is increasing every day. As each new book comes out, one naturally wishes to know whether its appearance is justified. The volume under notice contains little new matter, and yet from its conciseness and comprehensiveness it will, no doubt, prove acceptable to those who wish to study Wagner from his earliest down to his latest days. The first opera mentioned is "Die Feen," and two pages are even devoted to "Das Liebesverbot." The plots of the various works are briefly narrated, and the sources from whence they are drawn are given. Further, with exception, naturally, of "Das Liebesverbot," the guiding themes in each are given. And by way of close there is, for reference, a most useful index of all the musical themes. The new matter consists of certain brief reflections on, and even one or two criticisms of certain scenes in the music-dramas. The author is a great admirer of Wagner, yet he does not approve everything. He considers, for instance, the arrival of King Marke in the final scene of "Tristan" a "dramatic weakness," or, as he adds, "utterly superfluous."

Three Valses de Salon. For Pianoforte solo. Op. 9. By Theophil Wendt. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Three agreeable little additions to salon music are before us here, and the amateur will find in them some good work for agile fingers, and especially for the cultivation of a delicate touch. This is particularly the case in No. 1, the Valse in F sharp minor, which is at once the most ambitious as well as the most original of the three. Starting with a theme and suspended chords in the accompaniment, which recall Chopin in his dreamy and melancholy mood, it has nevertheless sufficient independence of character to free it from any charge of slavish imitation. The light arabesque accompaniment, introduced later on, and also the arpeggiando chords on the last page, require careful attention, in order to execute them with sufficient delicacy to keep them in the background and not to interfere with the principal melody. These Valses all presuppose a considerable amount of dexterity and musicianly feeling in the player, but this is more especially the case in the first number, which, in its executive requirements, is quite on a par with many of Chopin's Valses.

No. 2 (Valse gracieuse), though composd on more hackneyed lines, is nevertheless more "grateful" in the matter of melody, and on this account will probably be a greater favourite than No. 1, although the latter would appear to have had more thought and attention bestowed on its composition. The flowing, graceful melody and artless style (possibly ars celare artem) of No. 2 will assuredly recommend it. If we compared the first number to Chopin, we may, with equal justice, recall Délibes as the unconscious prototype of No. 2. Indeed, there is no doubt that an orchestrated version would form a very pleasing number for a theatrical entr'acte, like the favourite ballet-music of the French composer just named.

No. 3 (Valse dansante) involuntarily recalls the Valse in "Hänsel und Gretel," when the children come to the cake-house in the wood; but it is well thought out, and carried consistently through. It is light, it is pretty; and the unhackneyed accompaniment in the bass—a slight staccato on the first beat, followed by two single slurred quavers, which forms an under-melody on its own account—is a refreshing contrast to the customary accompaniment figure of ninety-nine Valses out of every hundred. The same may be said of the accompaniment to the second subject in C major, and of the fresh and piquant arpeggiando when the melody recurs in the treble.

The three numbers are dedicated to Mr. Frits Hartvigson.

Choir Training. Based on voice production. By A. Madeley Richardson. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

There have been several books written of late on Church Choir training, most of them possessing admirable features; but Mr. Richardson's compact little volume may unhesitatingly be pronounced to be one of the best, and it may confidently be said that no choirmaster, however experienced he may be, will fail to derive some benefit from reading its practical and earnest pages. Doubtless some will differ from certain of the methods set forth, but even such will admit that the means recommended are well calculated to attain their end. The plan suggested of putting by a small sum per week to accumulate for each boy, but only to be given to those who remain until their voices break, is calculated to stop the annoyance of boys leaving after they have been trained, and other suggestions indicate that Mr. Richardson writes with considerable experience of his subject. The following merits quotation: "No expression is of any avail without accuracy. No accuracy is complete without expression. The two may be taken to represent the masculine and feminine elements in musical performance, neither sufficient without the other. The two combined forming one perfect whole. The union of strength and elegance. The union of truth and beauty." Mr. Richardson says, and rightly, that: "A choirmaster must be a good disciplinarian; he must possess unbounded patience, unfailing energy, and an indomitable perseverance; also an even temper, a kind, quiet manner, a cheerful disposition, and a delicate and accurate ear"; but it was hardly necessary to state that "it is not everyone that will make a good choir-trainer."

Shakespeare and Music. With illustrations from the music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. By Edward W. Naylor. [J. M. Dent and Company.]

Shakespeare should be of special interest to musicians. He probably is; but even a widely read Shakespearian musician would probably find something to his knowledge-advantage in the pages of this valuable contribution to "The Temple Shakespeare Manuals" issued by Messrs. Dent. And the musician—if such an one there be—who has not dipped into his Shakespeare for the great Bard's references to the art should lose no time in making the acquaintance of Mr. Naylor's admirably compiled and attractive little book of some 200 pages. It is just the kind of companion for a quiet hour, and yet at the same time it gives much valuable information that many a musician would be glad to know. The main divisions of this handy pocket volume are: Technical Terms and Instruments; Musical Education; Songs and Singing; Serenades and "Music"; Dances and Dancing; Pythagoreanism, &c.; and Use of Musical Stage Directions. The Appendix contains several music-type examples of music in the time of Shakespeare, and the daintily executed frontispiece consists of a group of twelve Shakespearian musical instruments.

Bunte Reihe. For Violin and Pianoforte. Op. 30. By Ferdinand David. Dedicated to Joseph Joachim.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Twenty-four pieces in various styles, from easy to moderately difficult, in four books. No better material could possibly be desired than these pieces as studies in style, expression, and rhythm. All are beautiful, many are perfect gems. The present edition has the great advantage of being carefully edited by M. Emile Sauret, and many things which were doubtful in the first edition have been made clear, while nothing has been altered. We highly recommend these pieces to the notice of all earnest teachers as being indispensable to the training of the young violinist.

A Modern School for the Violin. Section II., Book II. By August Wilhelmj and James Brown.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Forty studies to be used concurrently with "Technical Practice." Book II. comprises extended examples of the following points—viz., first, second, and third position and the half position; major, melodic minor, harmonic minor, and chromatic scales; extensions, harmonics, shakes, chords, double stoppings in the first position, and several varieties and combinations of bowing, including martellato and the hook. These exercises are admirably adapted for their purpose, and will carry the student a stage farther in his progress. All that has been said in favour of the previous books of the School may well be repeated in praise of this—nothing could be better.

Chanson de Matin. For Violin and Pianoforte. Edward Elgar.

Leaflets. Six Easy Pieces for the Violin with accompaniment for the Pianoforte. 1. Allegresse; 2. Valse Lente; 3. Tarantelle; 4. Serenade; 5. Impromptu; 6. March. Siegfried Jacoby.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

The first of these is a graceful piece of moderate difficulty and may be highly recommended. It is quite charming.

Mr. Jacoby's Leaflets are six very useful pieces for teaching purposes, which may either be played in the first position entirely or with the shifts, according to the ability of the pupil.

Twenty-one Hymn Tunes. By John Sewell.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Inasmuch as these hymn tunes have been published in commemoration of his jubilee as organist of St. Leonard's, Bridgnorth, September 25, 1898, the composer may claim to be experienced in knowing the requirements of Church song. The tunes are intended for hymns in "Ancient and Modern," and include settings for most of the well known. Those who are dissatisfied with the music provided in the widely used hymn book, or who wish for change, may be recommended Mr. Sewell's collection.

School of Studies for the Pianoforte. Solos, Duets. Edited by Conrad Kühner. [Breitkopf and Härtel.]

There are many collections of pianoforte pieces designed to develop the abilities of the young and aspiring pianist, and their value greatly varies; but those published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel may be placed amongst the best. The series of solos comprise twelve books. The first begins with simple passages of elementary character, and with each book greater demands are made upon the executive ability of the player. The composers represented in the second volume of the pianoforte solos are H. Lemoine, C. Czerny, C. Kühner, J. B. Duvernoy, O. Wermann, C. Reinecke, L. Köhler, F. Le Couppey, E. Grenzebach, C. T. Wolff, and T. Kirchner. The pieces vary from twenty to forty bars in length, and have manifestly been chosen to cultivate independence of the hands and varieties of touch. The same principles are pursued in volume three, which comprises twenty-one pieces contributed by H. Bertini, F. Le Couppey, G. T. Wolff, E. Parlow, C. H. Döring, St. Heller, O. Wermann, C. Kunze, E. Grenzebach, and A. Krause.

The collection of duets is based upon the same lines and is of equal merit. As, however, in all such works variety of style is desirable, from an educational point of view, the entire omission of English composers is a mistake.

Three Pieces. No. 1. Mazurka. No. 2. Sérénade Mauresque. No. 3. Contrasts: The Gavotte, A.D. 1700 and 1900. For the Pianoforte. Op. 10. By Edward Elgar. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

To write a Mazurka that shall contain the traditions of a Mazurka, and be, notwithstanding, an unhackneyed composition, is by no means an easy task, and yet this Mr. Elgar has accomplished in the little work before us. Abruptly starting with a forte shake on the dominant of the key (D minor), followed by a hint of the coming subject, a short introduction of ten bars brings us to the Mazurka proper—a bold, original melody which takes hold of us at once. To this in turn succeeds a contrasting little subject of a more reflective turn, that savours of the "musette"; and when, sixteen bars later, begins the delicate Trio (pp and più mosso) in D major, though without change of signature, the chromatic nuances through which we now glide seem just the complement of what has gone before—not a bar too much in the piece, not a superfluous note from beginning to end, but all are parts of one consistent whole. Mr. Elgar has had something to say, and he has said it tersely, appositely, and powerfully, so that one feels the work to have been a genuine inspiration. We may add that there are no transcendental difficulties to be overcome, but that it is within the reach of the average player.

The same remark applies to No. 2, in so far that the stately Mauresque Serenade presents no great difficulties of execution. After a short preamble—just a gentle thrumming of the strings on a dominant foundation—the lover begins, in the eighth bar, his song to his lady-love; a delicate, persuasive melody (in the minor, of course, for does not the minor contain more sighs, more heart-throbs in its accents than the more blatant major mode?), formed on the harmonic scale with the raised fourth, which always adds a certain weirdness and melancholy to the expression. A second verse follows, with the melody repeated an octave higher, and a little undercurrent of melody for the left hand also. To this succeeds the Trio, naturally enough, in the tonic major; and after being given by the left hand in the tenor part, and repeated once more in the treble, the minor mode again recurs, and this is, without doubt, the most interesting and characteristic section of the composition. The working-out of the Finale is effective and decidedly uncommon, the first melody being repeated upon a dominant pedal, which continues through some thirteen bars, and which, moreover, ceases only with the cessation of the music, which, curiously enough, ends upon the common chord of the dominant; but so happily is this brought about that it does not in the least strike the ear as unfinished, but just as the most natural sequence of events.

Contrasts in tempo, key, accompanying figures, devices for breaking up the divisions of the bars, and so on—in all these points the above Gavottes answer to the title bestowed on them. The first, in G minor, starting off quite simply with a melody for the soprano, is immediately imitated by the alto, and this in turn by the bass. This Gavotte is carried consistently through in three parts, with merely the addition, here and there, of octaves to strengthen the bass. The second Gavotte, which enters in an abrupt manner in G major, is taken at a more rapid tempo; sometimes in three and sometimes in four-part harmony; fuller chords; new departures in phrasing and rhythm; all of which give it the impress of a different period. When 1700 recurs it is elaborated à la 1900, and from this point the work, which began so simply, is of far more than average difficulty, introducing a counterpoint which it will take some practice and careful fingering to divide up conveniently between the two hands; also quite a considerable number of shakes are introduced, which require some study, both alone and in conjunction with the other parts. It is only fair to add, however, that the contrapuntal part is written in small notes, to indicate that it may be dispensed with, should it prove too discouraging a difficulty to the student otherwise anxious to learn this piece.

Third Polonaise. For the Pianoforte. By Walter Macfarren. [Ashdown and Co.]

The stately old Polonaise is a well-worn theme, but Mr. Macfarren has succeeded in presenting it under a guise which, if not wholly new in itself, is none the less fresh and happily conceived. The first subject starts off at once with a bright and imposing theme in A major, with here and there a decided flavour of Weber about it. The second subject, which follows after a couple of pages in the relative minor, is a very pleasing one, and in this respect bears the palm. The second time it is ingeniously varied, thus preventing the possibility of monotony; and after an intermediate recurrence of the first subject, the second is employed again very charmingly in F major (instead of F sharp minor as before), thus inducing many beautiful changes of harmony, while keeping as near to the original melody as is possible. The interest of the piece never flags for a moment; it carries one along with it from first to last, and as it offers no pre-eminent difficulties in execution, it will doubtless be a popular salon piece. It is dedicated to the composer's pupil, Miss Mabel Colyer.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. No. 396-405. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Choirmasters in search of fresh settings of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis may be recommended Nos. 396 to 399 of this excellent series. No. 396 is a setting in G, by Henry Smart, in which the best traditions of the true church style are preserved. The music is in five vocal parts, the harmonies being enriched by the division of the sopranos. The style is contrapuntal, but diatonic in character, and although a well-trained choir is imperative, the part-writing will not prove difficult to those who possess a fair knowledge of music.

In No. 397 the evening Canticles have been set in A, in a less exacting manner, by William Russell. The choral writing is in four parts and is chiefly in solid harmony.

Mr. H. M. Higgs has provided the music to No. 398, and it is such that will interest its exponents. The Magnificat, in the key of A, includes an alto solo, and the Nunc dimittis opens with a passage for a tenor voice; but both of these are easy to sing, and the vocal part-writing will present no difficulties to a choir of average abilities.

No. 399, in D, by Ferris Tozer, is much simpler than any of the preceding. Several of the verses are set in unison for the voices, and the four-part writing is easy to read. Passages for tenors or sopranos in unison provide effective contrast, and the organ accompaniment in such portions possesses interesting independence. It may be added that the setting was specially composed for this year's festivals of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association.

Nos. 400 and 401 are melodious and devotional settings in four parts, on cards, of the Kyrie Eleison in E flat respectively by John E. West and Charles Macpherson.

Nos. 402 to 405 have been provided by Myles B. Foster. In No. 402 the Nicene Creed is allied to music in C of an emphatic character appropriate to the text. The sentences commencing "Who for us men" to "And was buried" are given to a bass soloist, but the remainder is written in solid four-part harmony. A feature of the composition is the effectiveness of the organ accompaniment.

No. 403 is a continuation of the Communion Service in C, and consists of the Sanctus set in four vocal parts. The music is simple and devotional.

No. 404 comprises the Benedictus qui venit and Agnus Dei. The former is opened with a bass soloist, who gives out the first sentence, which is subsequently repeated by the choir in four parts. The Agnus Dei begins with a treble solo, but this could be sung by the sopranos in unison.

Great variety with regard to the employment of the choir distinguishes the setting of the Gloria in Excelsis, which forms No. 405, and the varying sentiment of the text is carefully followed in an effective manner.

Novello's Short Anthems. Nos. 88 and 89.
[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Admirable examples of this series will be found in the above numbers. No. 88 is a brief penitential anthem by Mr. W. H. Cummings, the esteemed Principal of the Guildhall School of Music, and is an expressive and smoothly written, but richly harmonised setting of the Bible version of the 34th Psalm, 18th verse, "The Lord is nigh unto them."

No. 89 is a wedding anthem by H. Elliot Button, who has allied some lines of a prayerful nature by Dorothy Blomfield to music of a simple and devotional character. The little work includes a passage for male voices in unison or baritone solo, and the first verse might be sung by the sopranos in unison or by a soprano soloist. Some unaccompanied choral passages add further variety, and the conclusion would, if well rendered, be very impressive.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

Dr. Buck commenced his duties as organist of the Cathedral on June 25, upon which occasion the Mayor and Corporation attended in state in order to celebrate the honour bestowed upon the city by the chief magistrate being created Lord Mayor. In order to enable the lay clerks to take their summer holiday there will be no musical services in the Cathedral from the 31st ult. until the 12th inst.

Master Frank Merrick, thirteen years of age, son of Dr. Merrick, of Clifton, gave a pianoforte recital on June 27, at the Victoria Rooms. In November, 1895, when nine years of age, he gave his first recital at Clifton, and, in the meantime, M. Paderewski, who was charmed with his playing, gave him a letter of introduction to his own instructor, Professor Leschetitzky, at Vienna, under whom Master Merrick has been studying with success. His re-appearance, locally, was welcomed by a large and enthusiastic audience. He performed compositions by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and other masters with pleasing confidence, and his efforts were characterised by considerable brilliancy. It is probable that he will return to Vienna to continue his studies.

Midsomer Norton and District Choral Society had a concert in the grounds of Norton House, on June 27. The programme was made up of glees and part-songs, sung by the choir, and solos contributed by Miss Florence Cromey (soprano), of Bristol, Mr. Trowbridge (bass), of Wells Cathedral, and Mr. W. J. Kidner, conductor of the Society. Mrs. J. Thatcher was at the pianoforte.

Great attention is paid to the musical services at the Church of St. Thomas, Bristol, the vicar, the Rev. W. Mann, having formerly been precentor of Bristol Cathedral. On the 20th ult. an organ recital was given by Mr. W. A. Lamb, organist of the church. On other Thursdays recitals will be given by Mr. W. E. Fowler, All Saints', Corn Street; Mr. Robert Brandon; Mr. Atherstone Cox, St. Mark's, Bath; Mr. W E. Young, Broadmead Chapel; and Mr. Joseph Burn, SS. Philip and Jacob's.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

The annual general meeting of the Feis Ceoil Association recently took place at the Mansion House. The report of the executive committee upon the last festival was read and a general financial statement made. The festival musically was a greater success than any hitherto held. The competitions reached a higher standard than in previous years, and the public performances and concerts were highly artistic. The financial account is also more satisfactory, there being only a small deficit of under £50. The committee are full of hope for the future and look forward to the festival being completely self-supporting next year. Belfast was selected as the place of the next festival, but the Association is clearly anxious to go to the South of Ireland at the first opportunity, and there can be no question as to the utility of the movement being established as firmly in the South and West of Ireland as it is already in Ulster and Leinster. Cork will no doubt make a strenuous effort to secure the festival for 1901.

There was a general meeting of the Dublin Orchestral Society last month to authorise a transference of some monies from the Foundation Fund to the working capital. The sum of £250 was required over and above the annual amount handed out of the Foundation Fund towards expenses. This is only to be expected when one recalls that the Society started late in the musical season and there were so many initial expenses. The total sum which the five concerts and thirty-six rehearsals cost was something over £900, which is as small an amount as could be expected for such a big undertaking. Indeed, the expenses paid to officials are ridiculously low. Too much praise cannot be given to Mr. Leopold Dix, who has been indefatigable in his exertions and hard work as honorary treasurer on behalf of the Society.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

On the 25th ult. Dr. Villiers Stanford conducted, at New Brighton Tower, the concert representative of his own compositions. The principal feature was the well-known "Irish" Symphony, concerning which it is not necessary to say more than that it was played with due appreciation of the many touches of national feeling and local colour. Much of the interest of the concert centred in an excellent rendering of Dr. Stanford's prelude to "Œdipus Rex," part of the incidental music composed in 1887 for the Cambridge "revival" of the tragedy, and in the Concert Variations for pianoforte and orchestra, with Mr. Steudner-Welsing as pianist. The composer had a reception exceedingly cordial. The Berlioz concert, on the 2nd ult., which included the "Symphonie Fantastique," and did the orchestra and their conductor great credit, was conducted by Mr. Granville Bantock.

The "Parry" concert took place on the 9th ult., under Sir Hubert Parry's direction. His "English" Symphony in C major, the "Hypatia" orchestral suite, the "Dream of King Saul," the masterly Symphonic Variations for orchestra, and the "Overture to an unwritten tragedy" formed the programme.

On the 16th ult. another of these "personally conducted" concerts gave an opportunity too rarely enjoyed by a provincial audience of appreciating Mr. Edward Elgar's powers as a composer. A very enjoyable afternoon's work included Mr. Elgar's original and fascinating Variations for orchestra (recently produced at a London Richter concert), the Imperial March, the superb Triumphal March from "Caractacus," and the Serenade in E minor for strings. Mr. Reginald Brophy sang the song "As a Spirit didst Thou pass," from "The Light of Life," and the long but stirring scena beginning "And King Olaf heard the cry," from "King Olaf," and did full justice to them. Particular interest was lent to the concert by the production, for the first time in public, of "Three characteristic pieces" for orchestra (Mazurka, Serenade Mauresque, and Contrasts: the Gavotte, A.D. 1700 and 1900). They are early works, being numbered Op. 10, but they have recently been scored and partly re-written, and they well display Mr. Elgar's gift of inventing fresh melodies and captivating rhythms, and they are scored with the cunning of a past master of his art. Altogether this was one of the most interesting and enjoyable concerts of the series, as far as it has progressed, a series which has shown and will show that there is no lack of beautiful British music upon which to draw when arranging orchestral concerts. For his devotion to our native art Mr. Granville Bantock deserves the warmest thanks of all British musicians, and we exclaim, o si sic omnes! But why has he altogether omitted his own name from the list of British composers represented at this festival? Such modesty is almost uncanny.

On the 29th ult. the pupils of the Liverpool College of Music, under the direction of Mr. C. Courvoisier, essayed the Overture to "William Tell" and a selection from Schubert's "Rosamunde." The performance was attended by marked success. The instrumental and vocal solos also reflected credit on the College, which it is satisfactory to note is increasingly prosperous.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

The annual examinations held at the close of each session, in the Owens College, of the composition classes established and controlled by Dr. Henry Hiles, the acting professor of music in the Victoria University, have passed off very successfully. Upon two candidates, Miss Katharine Walker and H. M. Sheaves, who had completed the course of instruction and had submitted satisfactory exercises, the degree of Bachelor of Music was conferred, on the 1st ult. At our Royal College of Music selections from the exercises of the students who graduated last year have been performed with very gratifying results. The Motet of Thomas Keighley showed considerable experience in orchestration as well as mastery of form, while that of J. C. Bradshaw gave evidence of melodic fertility and freshness.

At the last open practices of the students of the College of Music the steadily continued progress of the pupils was shown, especially in the instrumental departments. The pianoforte playing of some of the more advanced students was excellent, while the performance of several of the young violinists who enjoy Mr. Brodsky's guidance was highly artistic. And it was gratifying to find that most promising young violoncellists are multiplying, and that even some of the wind instruments, especially the oboe, are being diligently studied. It must, of course, take some time to develop all the orchestral resources of the College, and to form a well-balanced choir, but, happily, the Manchester orchestra is especially rich in the wood and wind department, and masculine vocal aid is easily obtainable for the rendering of choral works.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

CHOIR FESTIVAL IN YORK MINSTER.

The only musical event of general interest during the past six weeks has been the annual meeting of the North-East Cathedral Choirs Association, which took place at York on June 27. The nucleus of a chorus of nearly 700 voices was formed by the Cathedral choirs of York, Durham, Ripon, and Wakefield, to which were added parochial choirs from Scarborough (St. Martin's), Heaton, near Bradford, Dewsbury, Mirfield, Harrogate (St. Peter's), and Garforth, near Leeds. To these there was added an orchestra of seventy, barely strong enough to make much effect against so large a chorus or in so vast a space as the Nave of York Cathedral, but valuable as an earnest of what may be accomplished in future years.

The musical service contained much that was new and interesting. According to precedent, the organists of York, Durham, and Ripon all contributed to the programme of music. Mr. T. T. Noble provided an excellent festal setting of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, broad and dignified in character, and, while thoroughly melodious, free from any of that sugariness which disfigures so much of our modern church music. He was also represented by one of the anthems, an unaccompanied motet, founded on Tate and Brady's version of the Eighth Psalm, "O Thou to whom all creatures bow." This is a strong and vigorous work, broad and simple in its lines, but full of well-wrought contrapuntal effects. It is for a double chorus, and is based on an original hymn-tune of the older and stronger type, which is made the subject of a series of variations. The motet is, as a whole, of a kind of which we should like to see more examples in contemporary church music, which too seldom deviates into dignity.

Professor Armes was, as usual, represented by his hymn tune "Hail, festal day," one of the very best things of its particular kind; but he also contributed an important anthem, "The Lord is my light and my salvation" (Psalm xxvii.). It is in five movements. The opening one is a bright and vigorous chorus, then comes an alto solo, which would doubtless be more pleasant to listen to were it allotted to the female contralto voice, but is well-written and melodious. Then a short semi-chorus serves as introduction to a movement in canon, 4 in 2, for the chorus, a dexterous piece of workmanship. A very effective chorus, ending with dignity on a sustained cadence to the word "Amen," ends the anthem.

Dr. Crow, the Ripon organist, modestly confined himself to a hymn-tune, and the other anthems were J. Christoph Bach's "I wrestle and pray" and an arrangement of a movement from Haydn's "Stabat Mater," by Dr. Crow, who supplied as a fresh text the Collect for the seventeenth Sunday after Trinity, "Lord, we pray Thee." However one may object to such treatment in principle, it is impossible to deny the charm and reverent feeling of the music, even in its altered form.

The duties of conducting and organ playing were shared by the three Cathedral organists, and the performances were generally good, though more satisfactory on their vocal than their instrumental side. Elgar's Serenade was played by the strings before the service, and after it the orchestral movements from the "Hymn of Praise" were given. In the latter there was some unsteadiness, excusable enough where, in default of a platform, all the performers have to be placed on the same level as the congregation.

An excellent concert was given at the Public Hall, Croydon, on the 14th ult., by the students of the Croydon Conservatoire. The Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor, was responsible for the greater portion of the programme, and its contributions included Dvořák's Nocturne,; Zwei Abendlieder, by Goetze; Meditation, by H. Lane Wilson; and Serenade, by Mozart, all for string orchestra. The students gave evidence in all these pieces, especially in the last-named, of the skilful training of their talented conductor. Miss Edith C. Knowles played one of Chopin's Ballades. Two of the professors of the Institution, Mr. Peter Musson (vocal) and Mr. Charles Fry (elocution), assisted, the orchestra taking efficient part with the latter in "King Robert of Sicily" with Mr. John E. West's music, the pianoforte part being ably played by Miss Van der Heyde.

A musical service was held in the Barry Road Wesleyan Church, Peckham Rye, on the afternoon of Sunday, the 9th ult. The music, selected entirely from the works of Mendelssohn, included the following selections: "Hear my Prayer" (solo, Miss Kate Cherry), Organ Prelude (No. 2), several airs from the oratorio of "St. Paul" and "Elijah," the solo and chorus "I praise Thee, O Lord" (solo, Mr. T. J. Morgan), the 13th Psalm (solo, Mrs. Alfred Furse), and the Finale of the first Organ Sonata. The music, which was appreciatively listened to by an audience of about 700 persons, was under the capable direction of Mr. Alfred Furse, the organist and choirmaster of the church.

The newly formed Hampstead Choral and Orchestral Society recently gave its inaugural concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire, under the conductorship of Mr. Jules Koopman. The programme included Gluck's "Iphigenie in Aulis" Overture, Mozart's G minor Symphony, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The soloists were Madame Medora Henson, Miss Violet Andrews, and Mr. Otto Fischer Sobell. Some pianoforte pieces were ably contributed by Madame Fischer Sobell, and Dr. E. H. Turpin presided at the organ. The concert was a great success.

The "North-West London Choral Society" is the title of an association that has been formed for the purpose of giving concerts in the North-West district of the metropolis. According to the prospectus, "The aim of the new Society is to produce choral and instrumental works of the highest class, both British and Foreign, which are not so frequently heard in London." A full orchestra will be engaged for the choral concerts. The conductor of the Society is Mr. W. H. Speer, and full particulars as to membership, &c., may be obtained from Mr. J. D. Perrott, 59, Queen's Road.

The Choir and Choral Society of Marylebone Presbyterian Church, together with the Marlborough Place Amateur Orchestral Society, gave a performance of Gaul's "Holy City" in Marylebone Presbyterian Church, on the 10th ult. The soloists were Miss Edith Serpell, Miss Lallie Hodder, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. R. Courtier-Dutton. Mr. A. R. Musgrave, the organist of the church, presided at the organ with skill and effectiveness, while Mr. Paul Oppenheimer successfully conducted a meritorious performance.

Mr. George R. Ceiley, after twelve years' service as organist and choirmaster of the Parish Church, Gravesend, has been the recipient of a handsome testimonial in the form of a cheque from the clergy, choir, and members of the congregation, on his leaving Gravesend to take up a similar appointment at St. John's Church, Cambridge Gardens, Kilburn. Mr. Ceiley formed the St. George's Choral Society, of which he held the conductorship, as well as that of the Gravesend Merchant Seamen's Orchestra.

The annual dinner of the members of the Royal Academy of Music Club took place on the 21st ult., at the Café Monico, and proved a more than usually interesting function. Mr. Walter Macfarren presided, and was supported by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Mr. Val Prinsep, and many other gentlemen eminent in the world of art. A selection of glees, part-songs, &c., was admirably given by the Angelus Part-Singers.

The death is announced of Frederick Handel Lemare, an enthusiastic organist and sound musician, eldest son of the late Frederick Lemare, of Guildford, and brother to Dr. William Lemare, of London.

At the Graduation Ceremonial at Edinburgh, on the 29th ult., the Degree of Mus. Doc. was conferred, in absentiâ, by that University on its Emeritus Professor, Sir Herbert Oakeley.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Barcelona.—The new opera, "Maria del Carmen," by the talented young composer, Antonio Granados, was produced at the Royal Theatre, on June 28, and most favourably received.

Bayreuth.—The sum of 10,000 marks has recently been contributed by a wealthy manufacturer, Herr Bernhard Loeser, towards the existing fund for enabling poor students and others to witness the Festspiele.

Berlin.—A new music-drama in five acts, "Die versunkene Glocke," by Heinrich Zollner, was brought out at the West-End Theatre, on the 8th ult., and its reception by a numerous audience was highly favourable. The libretto, from the pen of the composer, is founded upon Gerhart Hauptmann's popular drama. At the same theatre Herr Bertram, the whilom Munich baritone, and his wife (Frau Moran-Olden) have made several appearances recently, with considerable success.——A new opera, "Cain," by Eugene d'Albert, to which H. Bluthaupt has written the libretto, has been accepted for performance at the Royal Theatre.——The proceeds of the concert (about 5,400 marks) recently given in honour of Dr. Joachim have, in accordance with the expressed desire of the great violinist, been divided between the fund for the projected joint Haydn-Mozart-Beethoven monument, in Berlin, and that for the Goethe Monument, to be raised in Strassburg.

Cologne.—A new Overture to Shakespeare's "Tempest," by Anton Urspruch, was recently produced at the fourth popular symphony concert, under Dr. Wüllner's direction, and greatly appreciated by reason of its impressive themes and highly effective instrumentation.

Dresden.—Verdi's "Ernani" was successfully revived, last month, at the Royal Opera, and a cycle of the veteran Maëstro's operas is being prepared for the coming season. ——According to the annual report just published, the number of pupils at the Royal Conservatorium during the past academical year was no less than 1,210.

Essen.—A very efficient Municipal Orchestra has recently been established in this town, towards the maintenance of which the celebrated house of Krupp, equally ready, it would seem, to minister to the arts of peace as to those of war, has subscribed an annual contribution of 20,000 marks.

Genoa.—A choral and orchestral work, entitled "Tesoro di Mirea," by Signor L. Alberti, which has obtained the first prize in a competition opened some time since, is to be first produced in connection with the forthcoming celebrations of the Festival of St. John the Baptist. In anticipation of the latter a new oratorio "Johannes," by the Maëstro Lorenzo Parodi, was performed last month and very favourably received.

Halle.—The well-known Singakademie, under the direction of the University musical director Herr Reubke, celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of its foundation, on June 29, with an excellent performance of Handel's "Joshua." In connection with the event, a committee has been formed for the purpose of raising the funds for a monument to be erected to Robert Franz, one of the founders of the Singakademie.

Leipzig.—The last concert of the season of the Riedelsche Gesangverein, under Dr. Göhler's direction, took place, on June 22, at the Church of St. Thomas, and included the performance of a Psalm by the little-known sixteenth century composer, David Koehler, of Zwickau; a striking example of polyphonous, yet transparently clear and expressive writing, which excited general interest. It is the intention of Dr. Göhler to resuscitate some other compositions of this Protestant contemporary of Palestrina and Orlando di Lasso in the course of next season.

Lisbon.—Senhor Vianna da Motta, the excellent pianist, has started upon his second concert tour in various parts of South America, for which a substantial sum has been guaranteed him. As on the previous occasion, the artist will confine himself entirely to the interpretation of classical music.

Munich.—The regular season at the Royal Opera came to its close, on June 30, with a performance of "Fidelio," in which Fräulein Ternina took her leave of the Munich public as a member of the Royal establishment, amidst numerous demonstrations of regret.

Paris.—The annual gratuitous performances at the Opéra, on the 14th ult., consisted of Méhul's "Joseph" and the ballet "Coppélia," the proceedings commencing with the singing of the "Chant du Départ" and terminating with the "Marseillaise."——At the Opéra Comique the 1,400th representation of Adam's "Le Châlet" was recorded on the 8th ult. This house, which is now closed for the vacation, will re-open in September, with M. Massenet's "Cendrillon," by far the most successful novelty produced during last season.——M. Lamoureux has now definitely arranged about his projected performances of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde"; an event looked forward to with eager interest by admirers of the Bayreuth master for some time past. There will, it is announced, be ten representations of the work, commencing in October next, to be given at the Nouveau Théâtre, which is now undergoing the necessary alterations for the purpose.

Prague.—In memory of the late Johann Strauss, a special performance took place at the German Theatre, on June 26, of "Die Fledermaus," preceded by Mozart's "Maurerische Trauermusik," and concluding with an apotheosis of the "Valse-King," artistically represented by a tableau vivant.——The annual "Slavonic Concert," recently given under the direction of M. Cech, included three interesting novelties—viz., a symphonic poem, "Holoubek" ("The Dove"), by Antonin Dvorák; an overture "Udalrich and Bozena" (Op. 52), by Zdenko Fibech; and a symphonic poem entitled "Kreml," all of which, particularly Dvorák's work (illustrating a somewhat gruesome ballad by Erben), were received with much favour.

Rome.—Don Lorenzo Perosi has completed the score of a new oratorio, entitled "Natalia," the first performance of which will probably take place next month.

St. Petersburg. — A new one-act opera, "Amor's Revenge," comprising seven female rôles but not a single male, was brought out last month at the National Theatre and well received. The composer is M. A. Tanajeff, a young musician, favourably known, outside his native Russia, as the composer of some orchestral works.

Vienna.—In memory of the late Johann Strauss, a special performance of Brahms's "Requiem" is to be given, in October next, by the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde, with the co-operation of the Philharmonic orchestra, the receipts being intended to form the nucleus of a "Johann Strauss Fund" for talented young musicians. Amongst the papers of the late Johann Strauss have been found, in addition to the partly finished score of the ballet "Aschenbrödel" (Cinderella), intended for the Imperial Opera, a number of dances, as yet unpublished, and a fantasia for orchestra, said to have been his last composition.——The chair of harmony and composition, vacated by the death of Anton Bruckner, at the University, has been conferred upon Herr Graedener, one of the professors at the Conservatorium.

Zwickau.—The sculptor, Herr Johann Hartmann, has been commissioned to execute the monument to be erected in this town to Robert Schumann, for which the sum of 37,000 marks has already been subscribed.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SIR JOHN STAINER ON THE SPEED OF HYMN TUNES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—I was much interested in reading your report of Sir John Stainer's last lecture at Oxford, when he took as his theme, "The influence of fashion on the art of music." In reference to that part of it, "The speed of hymn tunes," I can quite corroborate Sir John's remarks. Some few years ago, when in Rotterdam, I attended a service in the Cathedral there, and I never heard hymn tunes sung so slowly, every minim seemed to be at least a breve! A very large congregation was present, and all seemed to join in the hymns, singing in unison. Had there been something approaching life in the singing the effect would have been very grand. My apology for taking up your space is that some of your readers may have thought that Sir John Stainer's remarks were exaggerated; but I can fully endorse them.—Yours faithfully,

Edward Bunnett.

A UNIFORM MUSICAL PITCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—The desirability of the adoption of a uniform musical pitch in this country has long occupied the attention of musicians and makers of musical instruments, but it has never before been discussed so much as it is being at the present time.

When the Philharmonic Society in London a few years ago decided to lower its orchestra to what was, to all intents and purposes, the Continental pitch, that decision led to considerable confusion. Sufficient time has, however, now passed to show the desirability of the new Philharmonic pitch being generally adopted. Organs in many halls and churches have been lowered at considerable expense, and all the best wind orchestral players are now provided with instruments at both pitches.

So far, pianoforte makers have held aloof and made no united effort to secure uniformity in regard to the pitch at which their productions are tuned. Some favour one pitch and some another. The consequence is that if a visit be made to any of the large emporiums in provincial towns where many pianofortes are sold, the visitor is hampered in his choice by seldom finding all pianofortes in the same show-room tuned to a uniform pitch, as they would be in a similar warehouse on the Continent. If an occasional pianoforte dealer decides to keep all the instruments he has in stock at a uniform pitch, the result is not always satisfactory. A pianoforte, carefully tuned to the low pitch before being sent to him, may be raised, or a high pitch pianoforte lowered, and the instrument given a different tension to what the manufacturer intended; not that the raising or lowering of pitch injures any pianoforte, but, if the alteration is made, the pianoforte requires usually more than one careful tuning to make it stand.

In regard to concert grands, the want of uniformity in regard to pitch is serious and necessitates makers keeping a double number of those instruments.

There are other reasons which could be given to show why the vexed question of pitch should be definitely settled in the pianoforte trade.

Had any of our neighbours moved in this matter, we should have gladly supported the object in view. As it was necessary, however, for someone to take the initiative, we addressed the following letter, last week, to the leading firms in our trade:—

"You are aware that the pitch for pianofortes in Great Britain has been a vexed question for the past few years, causing pianoforte manufacturers a great deal of trouble and inconvenience.

"We feel sure you will agree with us that the time has now come for the leading pianoforte manufacturers to settle once, and for all, what pitch shall be adopted in Great Britain as the standard pitch for pianofortes, both for retail and wholesale purposes.

"We, for our part, are confident that the pitch for pianofortes should now be A = 439 Diapason Normal at 68° F., that being the pitch now adopted by the Philharmonic Society, the Queen's Hall Orchestra, and the leading musical institutions in London, and by almost all our leading musicians.

"In such an important matter as this, it is of the utmost consequence that the leading pianoforte manufacturers should be entirely unanimous and take a firm stand.

"It is proposed that this pitch (A = 439) be adopted as the standard by pianoforte manufacturers on and after September 1, and that C = 540 (A = 454), the late Philharmonic pitch, shall then be regarded as the exception and not the rule as is now the case.

"May we ask you to favour us with your careful consideration in this matter, and to oblige us with a reply, stating your decision, at your convenience?"

The replies received have almost all expressed approval of the suggestion. We should like to quote the letters in full, but as this would encroach too much on your valuable space, the following brief extracts may suffice:—

Mr. Lindlar, on behalf of the house of Bechstein, writes: "I quite agree with you that the confusion now reigning as regards pitch should be settled in some definite way if possible." Mr. Whelpdale, on behalf of Messrs. Blüthner, writes: "We hasten to inform you that for the past twelve months we have sent out all our pianofortes at the new Pilharmonic pitch, and we have experienced no difficulty whatever with either the public or the trade." Messrs. John Brinsmead and Sons write: "We shall be glad to welcome the Continental pitch . . . as soon as possible but . . . we must await the decision of our trade customers." Messrs. Chappell and Co., who are military instrument makers as well as pianoforte manufacturers, are at present unable to make the alterations suggested. In a personal interview, Mr. John Collard, of Messrs. Collard and Collard, said that his house had long tuned all pianofortes to their own "medium" pitch, but he would have a couple of instruments lowered experimentally, and, if the rest of the trade decided, his firm would willingly "come into line." Messrs. Challen and Son reply: "We entirely agree. . . . The present unsettled state of the question is a frequent source of trouble and inconvenience to us." Messrs. S. and P. Erard write: "No one will be better pleased to see the vexed question of the pitch for pianofortes settled than we ourselves, and we shall have very much pleasure in supporting you in your efforts towards that end in every possible way." Mr. John Hopkinson, on behalf of Messrs. J. and J. Hopkinson, writes: We do not wish to stand out . . . if the low pitch is generally approved by pianoforte manufacturers." Messrs. George Rogers and Sons write: "We are quite ready to take part in this movement directly the unanimous co-operation of the leading makers is secured." Perhaps, however, the most interesting letter is that from Mr. Eshelby, of Messrs. Steinway and Sons, who expresses his firm's perfect willingness to co-operate in the matter, but suggests that a society might be instituted to further the adoption of a uniform pitch, and raise money to assist bands to replace their present instruments and also to aid in lowering the pitch of large organs.

The opinions of two of the largest pianoforte distributing firms should here be added. Messrs. Forsyth Bros., of Manchester, write: "We quite agree that the time has arrived for the standard pitch for pianofortes to be settled once and for all. . . . We are convinced that it will be for everybody's benefit if this change be made." Messrs. Paterson, Sons and Co., of Glasgow, cordially agree, and add: "May we suggest that you carry with you the principal American organ manufacturers."

We are, Sir, your obedient Servants,
John Broadwood and Sons.

HANS RICHTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—In your July number I read an amusing passage in the article on Hans Richter, mentioning his small knowledge of English, which reminds me of a case in point.

At a rehearsal, which I had the privilege of attending, the great conductor suddenly pointed his finger at one of the orchestral performers, calling loudly: "The —— is wrong! A—s!" (it sounded "Ass!")

A hearty titter ran through the audience at this apparently vituperative epithet hurled at a worthy musician; but the orchestra joined in the laugh, well-knowing the German nominations of the scale—As being merely A flat, and not an offensive invective. But an ignoramus might have felt scandalised at such an appellation being addressed to a professor.—Your constant reader,

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Brixworth.—Mr. W. Preston, the recently appointed organist and choirmaster of All Saints' Church, has been presented with a silver-mounted Malacca walking-stick by the gentlemen of St. Margaret's Choir, Leicester, as a memento of his twelve years' work amongst them.

Durban.—The first Festival of the Durban and Coast Church Choir Association was held in St. Cyprian's Church on Thursday, June 22. The service included Magnificat and Nunc dimittis (Calkin in F) and anthem, "O praise the Lord" (Barnby), the Hallelujah Chorus (Handel) being rendered after the Benediction. It is hoped by the committee to have a similar festival next year, but with music of a more advanced character, the present one being solely an experimental measure. Mr. J. F. Brown conducted and Mr. J. Frank Proudman presided at the organ.

Exeter.—The annual Festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association was held in the Cathedral on the 6th ult. The united choirs numbered between 700 and 800 voices. Mr. T. Royland-Smith conducted, and Dr. G. J. Wood presided at the organ. Smart's Te Deum and Jubilate in F was sung; the anthem was Stainer's "Sing a song of praise," the verse part being taken by the Cathedral choir. A brief but very useful address on the subject of Praise was delivered by Canon Furze, Archdeacon of Westminster, and the whole service was eminently satisfactory.

Hawkhurst.—On the 5th ult. two open-air concerts were given by the Choral Society, in the grounds of New Lodge, for the purpose of raising funds for the Society. Both vocal and instrumental music was given and highly appreciated by the large number of visitors to the lovely grounds. The soloists were Mrs. Coles, the Misses May Gregory, Oliver, and Howlett, and Mr. Whitburn, who also conducted.

Kirkley (Suffolk).—Gaul's "Holy City" was rendered in the Parish Church, on the eve of St. Peter's Day, June 28, by the Kirkley Madrigal Society and Church Choir combined. The soloists were Mrs. Linwood Watson, Miss M. Parker, Miss A. Mills, Messrs. E. W. Moore and J. J. Manning. Mr. H. D. Flowers presided at the organ, and Mr. Philip Chignell conducted.

Minchinhampton.—On the 20th ult. a performance of Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The Woman of Samaria" was given in the Parish Church by a choir of eighty voices. The soloists were Miss Etta Smith, Miss Aikin Sneath, Rev. H. Hult, and Rev. C. Hartley. Mr. John Nankwell accompanied on the organ.

Petersham (Australia).—On May 31, after choral Evensong, a fine rendering of Gaul's "Ruth" was given at All Saints' Church. The augmented choir, numbering seventy voices, gave evidence of the care and pains taken by the choirmaster, Mr. W. T. Wood. The solos were ably sustained by Miss Green, Miss La Roche, Miss Holmes, and Mr. T. Kirkby. Mr. W. Angus rendered efficient service at the organ.

Port Elizabeth.—On June 15 Mr. Roger Ascham gave a pianoforte recital, when he played selections from the works of Handel, Scarlatti, Chopin, Grieg, &c., in addition to three pieces of his own composition.

Reedyford.—Some interesting and very successful musical services were held on June 18, in connection with the Sunday School anniversary services of Trinity Wesleyan Chapel. At the morning service Martin's Te Deum was sung, and Barnby's anthem, "Sweet is Thy mercy, Lord," when Miss C. G. Ashworth tastefully sang the solo. In the afternoon, five anthems, five solos, and an organ solo, admirably played by Mr. Widdop, were given; and in the evening, Martin's "Benedictus," Naylor's "Through the day" (Miss R. Roebuck successfully singing the solo), and Stainer's "I saw the Lord."

Trent College (Derbyshire).—On Speech Day, June 27, a select choir, under the direction of Mr. E. L. Grice, the organist and music-master, effectively rendered several popular part-songs, to the delight of the audience.

Walsall.—On the 1st ult. Mr. J. Flint, organist and choirmaster of St. George's Church, was presented with an illuminated address by a representative deputation on behalf of the clergy, churchwardens, choir and congregation of the church, in recognition of his valuable services during a period of eight years. Mr. Flint has recently resigned the post, and is now organist and choirmaster at the Pleck Parish Church.

Warwick.—On the evening of the 11th ult. Mr. John Hills, on behalf of the Warwick Musical Society, presented Mr. W. H. H. Bellamy with a gratifying testimonial upon his resignation of the conductorship of the Society, after holding it for thirteen years. The present took the form of a handsome solid silver inkstand and pen-holder, bearing a suitable inscription.

Wellington (New Zealand).—The Orchestral Society, under the able conductorship of Mr. Maughan Barnett, gave a concert in the Opera House on June 6. The programme included Beethoven's Fourth Symphony, Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" Overture, and works by Handel, Mendelssohn, Leoncavallo, and Tschaïkowsky. Mrs. Revell, the vocalist, pleasingly rendered songs by Schubert and Denza.

Whitby.—On June 24, under the auspices of the Temperance Society, a choral contest was held, at which seven male-voice and six mixed-voice choirs competed for four prizes, of the respective values of £10, £7, £5, and £3. The adjudicators were Mr. Belcher, of Leeds, and Messrs. Rennison and Hallgate, of Whitby. The selected pieces were Rogers's "Three Fishers," Leslie's "Lullaby of Life," Sullivan's "Beleaguered," and Hiles's "Hushed in Death." The prizes were won by Crosland Choir, Huddersfield; Hunslet Temperance Choir, Leeds; Cleveland Harmonic, and Harrogate Prize Glee Choir. The singing was good, the best choirs keeping admirable time, and showing precision of attack and intelligent phrasing.

Organ Appointments.—Mr. William Darley, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Jude's, Whitechapel.—Mr. J. A. Meal, Organist and Choirmaster to the Wesleyan Chapel, Selby.—Mr. H. Vincent Read, Organist and Choirmaster to Christ Church, Wanstead.—Mr. F. W. Baxter, Organist and Choirmaster to Dalry Parish Church, Ayrshire.—Mr. H. C. Collis to the Organ Scholarship, Worcester College, Oxford. — Mr. W. J. Kipps, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Martin's-in-the-Fields.—Mr. J. E. Leah, Organist and Choirmaster to the English Congregational Church, Aberystwyth.—Mr. J. H. Aldred, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's Parish Church, Pemberton.—Mr. J. L. Milnes, Organist and Choirmaster to Hollinshead Street Congregational Church, Chorley, Lancashire.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

F. H. S.—We do not know of any books on the subject. The information would have to be gathered from unexplored byeways. We thank you for calling our attention to the matter, and we shall endeavour to ferret out something and put the research in the form of an article. But why a limitation of the past fifty years? The whole of the present century would not only be more comprehensive, but more interesting, and possibly somewhat amusing.

Automaton.—We have no fancy for any such mechanical instruments; their terrible monotony soon palls upon a sensitive ear. Would you not find more satisfaction in playing simple music within your powers than in listening to machine-made strains? A course of finger gymnastics might help to supply the technical deficiencies you experience without taxing your declining health.

Musicus.—Schumann's "The Lotus Flower" may be sung at about ♩ = 104. The metronomic rate ♩ = 72, for "O rest in the Lord," is too rapid. It should be sung at a slower rate of speed, but not, as is too often the case, dragged out in a manner more sentimental than edifying, or even devotional.

A. H. C.—The old word-books of the Handel Festivals can only be procured second-hand or privately. That of 1857—which was really a preliminary Festival—does not contain the names of the chorus and orchestral performers, but the 1859 book gives this information, as do those issued subsequently.

H. A. E.—You could not do better than take up the violoncello, especially with the prospect that you have of concerted music in your own home; and you are not too old to begin learning that pleasure-giving instrument. Mr. Jules De Swert's Violoncello Primer will furnish you with a very good tutor.

Pinoch.—Chopin's Waltz in A flat (Op. 42) may be played at about 𝅗𝅥. = 84. Its form is designated by Professor Prout as "a kind of cross-breed between the binary and ternary forms," and therefore belongs to a class that may be termed "mixed forms."

A. H. E.—"The Musician: a Guide for Pianoforte Students," by Ridley Prentice (Curwen) will probably supply your need. It is issued in six books, each one of which contains a list of pieces carefully graded.

Perplexed Musician. — The strange looking notes in Clementi's "Gradus ad Parnassum" which perplex you are breves, printed in their ancient form. Therefore, they should be held their full value.

Notturno.—Spohr's Notturno (Op. 34) in C (not A flat) is published. Full score, six shillings; parts, ten shillings and sixpence net, and may be obtained of Messrs. Novello.

G. W. B.—You should submit your 1714 Montagna violin to Messrs. W. E. Hill and Sons, 140, New Bond Street, who, in return for a small fee, will give you an expert opinion upon its value.

J. A. C.—We cannot say if there is a Council connected with the school of music to which you refer, or whether the "school" has "the right to grant certificates."

N. L.—Consult "Practical Organ Building," by W. E. Dickson (second edition, 1882), and "Organ Building for Amateurs," by M. Wicks (1887).

"Fidelity."—Pauer's Pianoforte Primer will doubtless answer your requirements.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

⁂ Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventual episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. II.
CONTAINING
50 DOUBLE CHANTS.

Price Sixpence.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. II., Chant No. 23, by Lord Mornington, which is included on account of its great popularity.

HOHENLINDEN.

CANTATA

FOR CHORUS OF MEN'S VOICES (T.T.B.B.) & ORCHESTRA

THE WORDS WRITTEN BY THOMAS CAMPBELL

THE MUSIC COMPOSED BY PERCY PITT.

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.
String Parts (Printed) and Wind Parts (MS.), on hire.
Full Score, MS.

STANDARD.

Coming after Father Perosi's strains there is a danger of valuing the spirited work too highly, but it undoubtedly may be placed amongst Mr. Pitt's best attainments. The orchestration is masterly, and, although most elaborate, it is always justified by its effectiveness. The voice parts are written with equal skill. The storm and stress of battle are graphically set forth, the mystery of the early morn is suggested with peculiar weirdness, and the final verse is set in solid four-part vocal harmony, which forms an admirable contrast to the complexity of what has gone before, and makes a most telling conclusion.

MORNING POST.

It is splendidly graphic, admirably written for voices and orchestra, and altogether a work of great power and imagination. Particularly happy is the setting of the words—

"'Tis morn, but scarce yon level sun
Can pierce the war-clouds rolling dun."

The sudden contrast from the preceding turmoil is beautifully expressed. Mr. Percy Pitt, who is one of the most gifted of our rising composers, deserves great credit for this really striking work.

ATHENÆUM.

We find the music fresh, picturesque, and ably scored.

SUNDAY TIMES.

His setting of Thomas Campbell's poem reminds one of some vivid battlepiece, and brings to the imagination a scene of carnage unmitigated in its recklessness and horror. It is a fine piece of descriptive music, and as short as it is bold and graphic.

GLOBE.

The work is extremely modern in character, and shows considerable powers of picturesque writing, both for the voices and orchestra.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.

Without giving to "Hohenlinden" an additional beauty which it needed not Mr. Percy Pitt has at least found in it inspiration for much beautiful music. He deals, like all modern composers, in figures. But his figures were not mere rhythmical devices; mere subjects for development and treatment. They are genuine melodies, and often dangerously near being tunes. In "Hohenlinden" Mr. Percy Pitt's principal theme fits perfectly the rhythm of Campbell's lines, and, according to the ingenious annotator of the programme, is "typical of battle." The last theme of all is a beautiful song-like measure to the words, "Few, few shall part," &c.

STAR.

Campbell's familiar poem "Hohenlinden" is a good subject for a composer who, like Mr. Pitt, is a past-master of scoring. The orchestration of the choral ballad is remarkable. There is a short orchestral episode just before the words "It is dawn," which struck me as quite beautiful and original. The themes throughout are duly martial, and the chorus (of men only) is given plenty of solid work to do of the kind an English chorus likes so well, together with passages of a gentler kind which form an admirable contrast.

BIRMINGHAM GAZETTE.

Mr. Pitt has written dramatically and expressively, without straining after effect. His style is of the noble and enduring sort, and the only fault we have to find with "Hohenlinden" is that there is not enough of it. The music is so fine that we wish the 28 pages had been 56.

MANCHESTER COURIER.

Of all the younger English composers, none can control the resources of the orchestra with such skill and certainty as Mr. Pitt. Indeed, he need fear no comparison with any modern composer in this respect. In this ballad the scoring is masterly, and the orchestral episode descriptive of dawn is quite beautiful. The choral writing is effective and strong. The composer was loudly cheered and "called."

"The bulk of the solo work in the 'Hymn of Praise' fell to Miss Pallister, who more than justified her selection for the task."—Bradford Observer.

"Miss Pallister's singing of 'On mighty pens' left little to be desired. She has a wonderfully cultured voice, well under control, full of power, at once charming and pleasant."—Louth Weekly Paper.

"Building of the Ship."—"Miss Pallister has a voice of wonderful range, her lower notes being almost a deep contralto, while the high ones are clear and pure as the tone of a silver bell."—Mexbro' and Swinton Times.

"Ancient Mariner" and "Lobgesang."—"Miss Pallister made a decidedly favourable impression. She has a voice of considerable power and rare purity of tone, while her notes in the higher register are remarkably clear and taken with wonderful ease. Added to this, also, is a refreshingly distinct articulation."—West Yorkshire Pioneer.

"Creation," Albert Hall.—"Considerable interest was centred on the appearance of Miss Pallister, a vocalist of rising fame. Her voice is a bright full soprano of extensive compass, and in the upper register, of sweet and almost exceptional quality."—Sheffield Daily Telegraph.

"St. Paul."—"Miss Beatrice Pallister was heard to great advantage in 'Jerusalem,' and the various recitatives were each delivered with fine effect."—Saltburn News.

"A good voice and pleasant to listen to. Style and phrasing most artistic."—Ernest Cavour, Esq.

"Figures in the front rank of baritones."—Rushcliffe Advertiser.

"Showed himself possessed of a fine baritone voice, and the rendering of his solos was exceedingly good."—Boston and Spalding Free Press.

Address, 24, Station Road, Hucknall Torkard, Nottingham.

(BARITONE),
SOLOIST, LEEDS MUSICAL FESTIVAL, 1898.
Of the principal North of England and Scotch Concerts, &c.

Molique's "Abraham."—"Mr. John Browning's dignified conception of the 'title-rôle' being particularly praiseworthy."—Musical Times, April, 1899.

"Seasons."—"Mr. Browning possesses a deep resonant voice, which he uses with reserve and judgment. 'Behold! along the dewy grass' was given with a breadth and tone which aroused the appreciation of the audience, and throughout he sang finely."—Huddersfield Chronicle, April 1, 1899.

"St. John's Eve."—"In the solo with chorus of female voices, 'That part will I play,' Mr. John Browning fairly brought down the house, and, in response to the continued applause, he again repeated the solo."—Louth News, April 8, 1899.

"Judas."—"Mr. John Browning, who made his first appearance at Saltcotes, at once showed himself a born artist and the possessor of a grand bass voice. No finer singing could be desired than that which he displayed in 'Arm, arm, ye brave,' whilst he fairly revelled in the splendid air 'The Lord worketh wonders,' giving a rendering which recalled recollections of the great Santley when at his best."—Kilmarnock Standard, April 8, 1899.

Carlisle Musical Festival.—"Mr. John Browning received an ovation in his several appearances at the Drill Hall last night."—Cumberland News, April 29, 1899.

"Mr. John Browning was a great success."—Carlisle Express, April 29, 1899.

"Samson."—"Mr. Browning is the possessor of a voice of first-rate quality. In the subdued and sorrowful, as well as the heroic parts, he was equally at home, and his work throughout the performance was thoroughly enjoyable. In the favourite solo 'Honour and Arms' he was heard at his best. He sang with a thorough appreciation of the music, and his sympathy was so manifest that he appeared to enjoy the song no less than the captivated audience. His effort was greeted with most enthusiastic applause, and altogether the song may be described 'as the best thing' of the performance."—Durham Chronicle, May 12, 1899.

"Mr. Browning, in the air 'Thy glorious deeds,' at once won the sympathies of his hearers. He has a taking rich bass voice, and happily knows how to use it to the best advantage. One of the finest performances of the evening was that of 'Honour and Arms.' The pathetic air 'How willing my paternal love' was a most appreciable number. The great charm of Mr. Browning's singing is the great regard he pays to the spirit of the words, and in this air he imparted such feeling that quite carried away his hearers."—Durham Advertiser, May 12, 1899.

Morecambe Pier Pavilion Concerts.—"Songs by Mr. John Browning, who is deservedly in great favour with the Pier audiences."—Morecambe Times, July 5, 1899.

Season 1898-99: sang solos in upwards of fifty works, and at an equal number of classical and ballad concerts.

FREDERICK NIECKS.

Edinburgh, beautiful for situation, is the joy of all those who can appreciate the picturesque. It is delightful to walk round about the city as it is bathed in the brilliant sunshine of a lovely August day, in the pleasant company of a cicerone who is one of the Towers thereof—the Professor of Music in its University.

The history of the Professorship may be briefly told. General John Reid, an amateur flute player and composer, whose portrait we give on the next page, bequeathed the sum of £50,000, subject to the life interest of his daughter, to the University of Edinburgh, the chief object of the bequest being to found a Chair of Music. This bequest became available in 1839, and John Thomson was appointed the first Professor of Music. He had no class of students, and only held his office for two years until his death in 1841. He was succeeded by Sir Henry Bishop, who did nothing more than conduct the annual Reid concerts (a condition of the bequest). Bishop, who probably preferred his "Home, sweet home," in London to the atmosphere of auld Reekie, was also a two years' Professor, as he resigned in 1843. To him succeeded Henry Hugo Pierson, who never went to Edinburgh, and consequently "did nothing" in the year during which he nominally held the post. In 1845 John Donaldson, an advocate, was appointed. He was the first Professor to do anything of a practical nature for the Chair. Professor Donaldson initiated an action at law against the University for the misappropriation of some of the endowment. After a long litigation success crowned his efforts. The Court of Session ordered a certain sum to be set apart for the cause of music in the University, thus carrying out the intentions of General Reid as expressed in his last will and testament. The outcome of this litigation was of a two-fold nature: (1) the stipend of the Professor was increased and a sum set apart for the working expenses attached to the Chair, and (2) the erection, in 1861, of the noble class-room, with its fine organ and its appurtenances, the museum and musical library—the whole forming a complete and separate building within the precincts of the University. Upon Donaldson's death, in 1865, Mr. (now Sir) Herbert Oakeley was appointed to the Professorship. He resigned in 1891, and was succeeded by Mr. Frederick Niecks, who forms the subject of this biographical sketch.

Frederick Maternus Niecks was born at Düsseldorf, February 3, 1845, Mendelssohn's thirty-sixth birthday. From his earliest childhood he was associated with music and musicians. The musicianship of the family commenced with his paternal grandfather, who was a well-to-do comb manufacturer; but a change of fashion terminated his prosperity, with the result that the amateur fiddler transformed himself into a professional violinist. The two sons of the former maker of combs became makers of music, of whom the father of Frederick, Johann Niecks, was the more talented. Most of his musical knowledge he picked up by observation and experience. He played the trombone in a military band and first violin when it was converted into a string and wind band. As a member of the Düsseldorf orchestra he played under the conductorship of Mendelssohn, Schumann, Hiller, and others. Herr Johann Niecks—who, for several years, conducted an orchestra with which, in the early fifties, he went for a season to Dieppe—was a prolific composer and arranger for the orchestra, mostly of dances and light genre pieces. Many a time has his son seen him sitting at a table in the middle of the room and all about him on the floor the wet sheets of the parts. The last time he composed was quite a wholesale affair. A new set of dances was required for balls. He obtained as many books as there were parts in the band and then set to work to fill them. He wrote with wonderful ease and could dispense with making a score. "It was through his conductorship," says his son, "that I became so early familiar with the orchestra, for the rehearsals were held in our house."

EARLY TEACHERS.

The first teacher of the youthful Frederick was his father, who began to instruct the boy when he was only six or seven years old. When he was a little older his father took him to the rehearsals and performances of the symphony concerts, and also to the theatre. When the colleague at the same desk expostulated with Herr Niecks that the "poor boy" could easily find some more congenial employment, the father replied that he liked nothing so well as music; but when Master Niecks was found to be fast asleep during the performance of one of the "immortal Nine" the colleague, pointing to the somnolent Frederick, observed: "Yes, that boy of yours appreciates Beethoven's music very much."

"My first systematic training as a violinist," recalls Professor Niecks, "I received from Wilhelm Langhans, who came to Düsseldorf as Concertmeister in 1857. To him I owe more than to any other teacher. He exercised a general influence over me: he introduced me to quartet playing and to sonata playing (with his wife, the excellent pianist, née Louise Japha), and, by his conversation, questions, and advice, drew my attention to and raised my interest in extra-musical things.

A FIDDLER AT THIRTY SHILLINGS A MONTH.

"I made my first appearance in public," adds Professor Niecks, "as a solo violinist at the age of thirteen in two movements of the B minor Concerto by De Bériot. I remember the festive frugal supper which we ate at home after this successful and (as it was thought) promising event. About the same period of my life I obtained my first engagement at the theatre. Before that time, however, I had already had stray engagements for balls and small concerts. Henceforth I was a full fledged musician—a little man who provided for himself. My salary at the theatre was not superabundant—ten thalers (thirty shillings) a month; but the highest salary then paid was only at the rate of about eleven shillings a week! The performances at the theatre included opera, tragedy, comedy, and vaudeville. I also played in the orchestra of the symphony concerts and took part in music-makings of a less exalted character. The latter were the chief bread and butter providings during six or seven months of the year. Many a curious scene I witnessed, and many a hardship I experienced in those days.

DRUMMING EXPERIENCES.

"But my first orchestral experiences were with the kettle-drums. My favourite place in the orchestra was beside the drummer, whom I carefully watched. I once ventured to ask him to let me drum. After considerable hesitation he complied with my request, at the same time keeping a steady eye on my drummings. Soon, however, he found that I could be depended upon and absented himself from the rehearsals for half-an-hour or so. All went well until a rehearsal of Marschner's 'Der Templer und die Jüdin,' where the drum part is very important. I enjoyed the work gloriously, and hoped the master-drummer would absent himself entirely. But, lo! there was a long rest to count, followed by a fortissimo bang and roll for the drum, solo. I missed the entry. The conductor turned round in a rage, ready to devour the defaulting drummer. But on beholding instead of the burly man a thin chappie sitting there he burst into a hearty laugh.

"My drumming experiences were not confined to the orchestra. I manipulated the same instrument (or rather couple of instruments) in a religious procession in a small town in the neighbourhood, where the people insisted upon having kettle-drums in the band. The drums were carried by two men (as proud as peacocks) with blue scarves across their shoulders. I walked solemnly behind adding my rolls and rub-a-dub-dubs to the slow marches and hymn tunes. I also cultivated the gentle flute-craft. Oh, to think of the many duets for two flutes I played with a youthful companion! Few musicians nowadays have any idea what a power the flute was in the early part of the century as a favourite solo instrument amongst amateurs. But I was able to realise something of that glory in looking at the bookcases in the library of my friend's father, which were full of flute music of various kinds."

His first teacher for the pianoforte—except his father, from whom he had received a few hints—was an organist in one of the churches in Düsseldorf, who also gave him lessons in theory. This good man seems to have had faith in the method of swimming masters—to plunge the pupil into the water and let him struggle for his life. The boy was soon engaged in harmonising chorales, and before long he was set to work upon composition exercises of a certain kind. "Bring me, next time," the master would say, "a short pianoforte piece expressive of love, rage, calm, or it might be joyousness or the like." No wonder that his father shook his head and wondered where the sources of inspiration for some of these things were to come from. For many years Herr Niecks and his son would play the violin together from six o'clock in the morning until the school hour of eight, allowing time for breakfast. An artist who lived in the upper floor of the house did not appreciate these early matutinal fiddlings. After one of the boy's public appearances he said: "You have given me great pleasure to-day, but you owed me something. What did I not suffer when you and your father began to play duets when I was in my best sleep! It is a good thing that you did not hear the language I then uttered."

AN ORCHESTRAL PLAYER.

After the departure of Langhans for Hamburg, Frederick became a violin pupil of Julius Grunewald, an excellent violinist, one of the two Concertmeisters and a teacher at the Conservatoire, Cologne. To save Niecks the expense of travelling, which he could by no means well afford, and as he could not settle in Cologne, Grunewald obtained for him an engagement at the Gürzenich concerts under the conductorship of Ferdinand Hiller, which were a source of education in themselves. Owing to Grunewald's illness (consumption) and early death, the lessons were interrupted and then ceased. A touching incident may be related in this connection. Grunewald asked his pupil whether he could afford to buy Bach's Sonatas and Paganini's "Capricci." "No," was the reply. "Very well," he said, "take my copy and keep it; I shall need it no more." He felt the near approach of death, and was not mistaken. With him passed away an amiable man and an exquisitely elegant, sweet-toned, and tasteful violinist.

BERLIOZ, AUER, AND TAUSCH.

"Amongst the many great musicians I saw at the Gürzenich concerts," says Professor Niecks, "none left a deeper impression upon me than Berlioz when he conducted his 'Harold' Symphony. He was like an extinct volcano. His face was almost expressionless, but one felt what it once was and what might still be behind it."

Leopold Auer, now solo violinist to the Emperor of Russia and professor of the violin at the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, was the last violin teacher of Frederick Niecks. His magnificent tone and grand classical style are well known. When Jules De Swert came to Düsseldorf, the two resolved to form a quartet party, with the intention of travelling. Niecks was chosen as the viola player. At one of the first practices De Swert, thinking that Niecks did not understand French, said to Auer: "Mais, il joue bien." Whereupon Auer laughingly replied: "Le beau merveille! N'est-il pas mon élève?"

On one occasion Niecks was playing without book Spohr's Eighth Concerto whilst Auer was dressing. He suddenly stuck in the middle of it. Auer, who angrily rushed in from the next room with one leg in his trousers and one leg out of them, took his pupil's violin from him and began where Niecks had left off. The master, however, also stuck at the same place. The stumbling-block seemed indiscoverable. At last the explanation was forthcoming. Niecks had modulated wrongly and played a passage in another than the original key, but at a certain point the passages were no longer playable.

In the meantime his pianoforte and harmony lessons with the organist (the only music teacher he had who received any fees from him) had ceased. Julius Tausch, the successor of Schumann as director, and in later years conductor of the Glasgow and Edinburgh concerts, then took the youth in hand and instructed him in pianoforte playing and composition. Tausch, highly gifted as a pianist and as a composer, was unfortunately of an indolent disposition. Niecks would sometimes wait for hours for his lesson. The following incident is an example of his dislike to teaching. Once he arrived at the house of a pupil at the time of a lesson, but begged to be excused owing to "an important engagement." "Come in and have a cup of coffee and a cigar," said the father of the fair damsel. Tausch consented and remained for two or three hours, evidently oblivious of the "important engagement." When asked to define a fugue, he replied: "A fugue! a fugue is a composition in which the parts run away from each other!"

SHATTERED HOPES!

"Sometime before Auer left," recalls his distinguished pupil, "he said to me: 'It is now time that you should make a name for yourself. Travel!' About the same time my doctor told me: 'You must definitely give up solo playing in public.' It is not difficult to imagine what my feelings were. Was this not the ruin of all my strivings, ambitions, and hopes? For the only idea I had was that of becoming a violinist. I then devoted myself entirely to teaching. My career as a teacher began at the age of fourteen, if not earlier. When I was fifteen I inherited several pupils, all much older than myself, from my master, Langhans. One of them was a Russian Countess, who played the piano very well, and with whom I played sonatas. I wonder who learned more: the pupil or the teacher!"

One incident of the orchestral period must be recorded. As the leader was absent by reason of illness young Niecks took his place. The opera was Meyerbeer's "Huguenots." In the first Act there is a solo for the viola d'amore, which is generally played on the ordinary viola. He played the solo as his father was too nervous. But the opera could not be continued beyond the first Act, and Kreutzer's "Das Nachtlager in Granada" was substituted, in the last Act of which there is an important violin solo which he had never seen before. However, there was no escape. He had to grapple with it, and got through all right and was applauded.

His early attempts at composition were dances, written for a small band, a solemn march for full orchestra, and, on the invitation of the first oboe player, a solo for oboe and orchestra. "Although," says Professor Niecks, "I composed these and subsequently a good deal of vocal and instrumental music, I never published anything. This abstinence will, I hope, make amends for my literary indulgences."

"PICKING-UP."—HARD STRUGGLES.

In regard to his general education, Professor Niecks gives some interesting particulars. "For some years," he says, "I attended a common elementary school and then I was sent to a private school, where, in addition to the usual subjects, foreign languages and mathematics were taught. There were no fees to be paid for my tuition, as my father taught the violin to the schoolmaster's son. I afterwards succeeded my father as the teacher and thus paid, as it were, for my own schooling. Owing, however, to my engagement in the orchestra, my school attendances were brought to a premature termination. The desire for knowledge instilled into me by Langhans became intensified as time went on. Now and then I managed to take some private lessons, but most of my knowledge was acquired by self-teaching and with the help of a friend. This friend was a youth about my own age and living in the same house, who had gone through a higher school and was then in a commercial office. Being very studious himself, he encouraged me to be so likewise, and kindly offered to help me. Every evening, upon my return from the theatre, I made my way to his diminutive bedroom, where there was no other sitting accommodation than on the bed; there I said my lessons and received further instruction. Ancient and modern languages, geography, history, literature, and heaven knows what besides, were earnestly studied. There we sat in winter without a fire, our greatcoats on with collars turned up, shivering with cold, but steadily bent upon our occupation. I made a time-table to serve me as a guide in my daily work. Each day in the week and every hour of the day had its special task—musical or literary—assigned to it. There was, however, one important omission in that time-table—not a single hour in the seven days of the week was assigned to amusement! It was a great boon when, through the intercession of a pupil of mine, a high government official, I obtained permission to take out books from the State Library (Landesbibliothek). How I revelled in the grand books to be found there! My professional friends were astonished at my literary tastes. On one occasion three or four of them burst in upon me and found me reading a big tome on Political Economy. They exclaimed: 'What in all the world makes you read such stuff?'

"The difficulty of finding the material for my studies was often very great. For a long time I had no French dictionary. I read Molière straight through without the aid of a dictionary when I had but a slight knowledge of the grammar and a still slenderer knowledge of the vocabulary of the French language. At the beginning of my reading I understood little of what I read: at the end I understood almost everything. I have still a lively recollection of my first struggle with 'Hamlet.' A study of another kind was drawing. I taught the daughter of an artist the pianoforte, and the artist in return gave me lessons in drawing. I drew from the flat and from casts. I now and then wrote letters to the newspapers on things musical and also some criticisms. My musical studies—harmony, counterpoint, and composition, as well as the playing upon instruments—were entirely practical during my residence in Germany. Although I had read a book or two on the history of music and a few other musical works, I may say that my studies in the theory, history, and æsthetics of music were begun after I came to this country, now thirty-one years ago."

A TURNING-POINT.—SCOTLAND.

The year 1868 was the turning-point in the life of Frederick Niecks. At that time there was a violinist and teacher of music in Edinburgh who gave excellent concerts of chamber music in the Scottish capital, he playing the first violin in the quartets. But he had no satisfactory viola player. He happened to be on a visit to Günther Bartel, the son of his old Sonderhausen master, at Düsseldorf. Bartel, who is an excellent violoncellist and teacher, and a charming composer of songs, introduced Niecks to the young Scotch musician, who is not unknown to fame in the person of Alexander Campbell Mackenzie. "Have you ever thought of settling in Scotland?" said Mackenzie to Niecks. Whatever the answer, events were quietly shaping themselves towards an affirmative response. Strangely enough, Sheriff Boyle Hope, of Dumfries, who was interested in the Edinburgh quartet concerts, told Mackenzie on his return that there was an opening for a professional musician in the death-place of Burns. The coincidence of requirements was remarkable. Negotiations were satisfactorily concluded whereby in November or December, 1868, Frederick Niecks left the Fatherland and became organist of St. Mary's Presbyterian Church, Dumfries, and a teacher of music in that Scottish town.

A great change has come over the "Kist o' whustles" and other "Sabbath" questions in Scotland during the last thirty years. When Niecks began his church duties he played upon a large harmonium with pedals. There were only two organs, both bad, in Dumfries at that period—one in the Episcopal church and the other in the Roman Catholic church: now there are seven or eight good organs, one of them in Greyfriars, where Niecks subsequently became organist. To take a walk on Sundays was then regarded as a somewhat sinfu' thing to do, and to make a call was looked upon as a "verra wicked proceedin'." But such traditions are now less strong than they were thirty years ago. While holding the post at St. Mary's, Niecks was asked by the priest of the Roman Catholic church of Castle Douglas if he would play the organ on Christmas Day, when Mozart's Twelfth Mass was to be performed. He consented. The Episcopalians of the same place, hearing of this, asked him to play also at their service on the same day. With a catholicity of spirit, the Presbyterian organist likewise consented. The chief elder of his own kirk afterwards said to him: "I heard that you were playing the organ at the Roman Catholic and Episcopalian churches at Castle Douglas on Christmas Day. I suppose there is no synagogue there." Niecks replied: "I am sorry to say—no."

AMUSING CONCERT EXPERIENCES.

He had some amusing experiences in his early Scottish days. Soon after his arrival a musicseller asked him to accompany the vocalists and a violin-playing bandmaster at a concert to be given by the volunteers of a small town on the West coast. To show that "conceited bandmaster" how to play the violin, he prevailed upon Niecks, after much persuasion, to play Ernst's "Carnival of Venice." In rehearsing it, the musicseller extemporised some variations of his own in the pianoforte accompaniment. The violinist protested and told his colleague that he must stick to the text. "All right," he replied. At the concert there was a harmonium as well as a pianoforte on the platform. The musicseller accompanist marched up to the harmonium, from which, in spite of Niecks's expostulations, he would not budge. There was no alternative but to go on. But in spite of his promise the musicseller could not restrain himself from those flights of extemporisation; therefore, after two or three variations, Niecks made his bow and retired. None of the singers at this concert brought any music whatever, and not a single one of them could tell the accompanist in what key they were going to sing. Each one started on "his own hook," so to speak, and Niecks, by hook or by crook, had to follow on and vamp an accompaniment as best he could.

In the early days of his residence in Dumfries he was also induced to accompany at some Saturday concerts, having for their object the improvement of the tastes of and to supply "rational amusement" to the good people of the town At one of these "improvings" a comic singer appeared with a blackened face. Between the verses of his song this "nigger" interpolated some "talkee-talkee." Poor Niecks, therefore, had several bars' enforced rest. Judge of his astonishment when, at the end of his "gibberish," the black-faced gentleman turned to Niecks and said: "Sammy, play up!"

SIR A. C. MACKENZIE'S "DEPORTMENT."

For four years (1868-72) Niecks played the viola in the quartet concerts given by Mr. (now Sir) A. C. Mackenzie in Edinburgh. The date of the first concert at which he appeared was December 21, 1868. A little later—March 15, 1869—Mackenzie's String Quartet in G (MS.) was first performed and led by the composer. An amusing letter of this period from the leader, now the principal of the Royal Academy of Music, to his viola player may here find a place:—

> My dear Niecks
> . . . At the Literary concert a rather amusing incident occurred. I was walking up and down the artists' room waiting for my Scotch piece to come on when a rap came at the door. A spruce little man, who looked like a somewhat conceited Precentor, entered and gave me his card—> saying: "When can I make an appointment with you at your house?" "No use," I replied, "I am leaving town. What is it?" More smirks and bows from the D.M. "I have been at the concert" (bow), he said. "Well?" "I would like to give you some lessons." "In music?" said I. "No, sir. Your shoulders, sir—— your deportment is dreadful, you stoop so, you ——." "Death and fiends! Go out, sir! with your stupid nonsense." And without ceremony I turned the amiable little man out into the cold. It strikes me that he might be useful to you, Niecks. Our public appearances are so numerous that we ought really to study our personal appearances more. I have sent him your address. You will hear from him. Good-bye, old fellow.

INTELLECTUAL PURSUITS.

In 1872 Professor Niecks removed to Edinburgh; but owing to the failure of his health he was obliged, after a few months, to return to Dumfries. In 1877-78 he studied at the University of Leipzig, attending the lectures on logic, philosophy, psychology, æsthetics, history, literature, and the fine arts given by Wundt, Drobisch, Strümpell, Hermann, Springer, Von Noorden, and Biedermann. He took advantage of his vacations to visit Italy with a view of studying the architecture, sculpture, and painting to be seen there.

"When I settled in Dumfries," says Professor Niecks, "I had given up all ambitions; indeed, thought that I had only a few years to live. But this hopeless and aimless state did not deaden my intellectual curiosities and my joy in beauty, whether natural or artistic, literary, pictorial, architectural, or what else. All my wider and deeper reading in the theory, history, and æsthetics of music was done in this country. The reading of Helmholtz's 'Sensations of Tone,' in or after 1870, made an epoch in my life. On the other hand, Carlyle and Ruskin had a great influence upon me, and the French prose writers appealed to me by the lucidity of their style and thought. Among the educational factors have to be mentioned my frequent visits to London, France, and Germany—first, solely with an eye to art and scenery, afterwards also with a view to literary and musical research. Much of my holiday time was spent in libraries, most of it in the British Museum and the Paris Bibliothèque Nationale, some in the libraries of Brussels, Munich, Berlin, and elsewhere."

It would seem as if Frederick Niecks in his youth and early manhood must have had some presentiment of his future life-work. His voracious love of learning for its own sake, his steadfastness of purpose, and his indomitable perseverance in picking up self-acquired knowledge, all combined to equip him for the important position he now so worthily occupies. His career furnishes another instance of the success that invariably attends the earnest-minded, self-helping student, the self-made man.

THE REID PROFESSORSHIP OF MUSIC.

In the year 1891 the appointment of Professor of Music in the University of Edinburgh became vacant upon the resignation of Sir Herbert Oakeley. The very man for the post was close at hand in the student-musician of Dumfries. Amongst testimonials were those from Dr. Joachim, the late Sir Robert Stewart, the late Philipp Spitta (author of the "Life of Bach"), Henry Lavoix fils, Arthur Pougin, A. J. Hipkins, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and others. Frederick Niecks was duly elected on his own merits to the Reid Professorship in November, 1891, and the least that can be said as to the wisdom of the choice is that he is the right man in the right place.

He delivered his inaugural address on February 29, 1892. (This leap-year day proved to be a good omen of the strides that music has since made in the University.) The subject of his opening discourse was "Musical Education and Culture," which has been published by Messrs. William Blackwood and Sons. The Edinburgh Professorship has generally been looked upon as one of those comfortable posts in which the emoluments are not to be despised, while the work is not over-laborious. Whatever may have been its state of affairs in the past, Professor Niecks is too earnest and conscientious a worker not to do his utmost in regard to the duties appertaining to the Professorship. Fortunately for the furtherance of his ideals, the Scottish Universities Commission changed the old conditions of the appointment. The annual Reid concert was wisely discontinued. The last was in 1893, which, with the concert of 1892, was conducted by Professor Niecks. The Reid concerts were replaced by a series of Historical concerts given in each session under the Professor's direction. A scheme of graduation was also instituted. Moreover, the teaching of music was inaugurated.

A MUSIC-TEACHING UNIVERSITY.

Edinburgh is the only University where the subject of music is in the curriculum. The Chair of Music is therefore no sinecure. The Professor gives 140 lectures each session, in addition to correcting countless harmony, contrapuntal, and other exercises. Students, including ladies, not belonging to the University are allowed to attend the classes upon payment of a 5s. entrance fee and the usual class fees. The Historical concerts are a very important educational factor. The whole of the arrangements for these music-makings are carefully thought out and carried into execution by the Professor—in fact, music, like its Professor, is very much alive in the University of Edinburgh. Here, for instance, is the scheme for the next session:—

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

Faculty of Music.

PROFESSOR NIECKS.

The following Courses of Lectures, Theoretical and Practical Instruction, and Concerts, will be given in the Winter session of 1899-1900.

I. HISTORY OF MUSIC.

Lecture I.—Music in the Middle Ages.
Lecture II.—Music in the time of the Renaissance.
Lecture III.—Music in the 17th Century.
Lectures IV-XX.—Music in the 18th and 19th Centuries.
Once a week (Twenty lectures), Fee, One Guinea.

II. MUSICAL ANALYSIS.

Romanticism in Music, especially as exemplified in Schumann's Compositions.

Once a week (Twenty lectures), Fee, One Guinea.

III. HARMONY.

Twice a week, Fee, Two Guineas.

IV. ADVANCED HARMONY.

Twice a week, Fee, Two Guineas.

V. COUNTERPOINT AND COMPOSITION.

Once a week, Fee, Two Guineas.

VI. A SERIES OF HISTORICAL CONCERTS.

Fee for these Concerts, Half-a-Guinea. Those attending any of the Music Classes will have the privilege of free admission.

The programmes of Professor Niecks cover a great variety of all sorts of music—Choral music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries (Palestrina, Durante, Astorga, J. S. Bach, &c.); operatic music (from Peri and Caccini to Wagner); madrigals, glees, and chamber cantatas, Italian, French, German, and English music on old instruments; instrumental chamber music, &c., &c. During two winters Professor Niecks led a string quartet party, who illustrated in one session the development of the string quartet and in the second session the contributions of the Germans, French, Italians, and Slavonians to this branch of the art. The scheme for next winter comprises a Purcell concert (choral, solo vocal, and instrumental), a harp recital, a recital of Schumann's pianoforte works, and two concerts of string quartets by Haydn, Mozart, and Beethoven in his three styles.

Who will say that the Reid Professorship is a mere sinecure, or that the occupant of the Chair is a mere dry-as-dust theorist?

LITERARY AVOCATIONS.

It is now time to refer to the literary labours of Professor Niecks. The place of honour naturally falls to his magnum opus, "The Life of Chopin," published by Messrs. Novello in 1888. This monumental biography occupied him ten years in the writing thereof. It took its origin in an idea of writing an æsthetic appreciation of the composer, but the idea grew, with the result that the name of Frederick Niecks became known far and wide as a biographer of rare discrimination, painstaking accuracy, and the possessor of an excellent literary style. Suffice it to say that the "Life" is the standard work on the great Polish composer for the household instrument. The book was translated into German by his old teacher, Dr. William Langhans, who, after being active as a violinist and composer, made a high reputation as a literary man, whose writings include a "History of Music of the 17th, 18th, and 19th centuries."

Professor Niecks's other published literary works include—

"A Dictionary of Musical terms and Introduction to the Elements of Music," 1884: second edition in the same year.

"The flat, sharp, and natural," an admirable researchful paper read before the Musical Association, on March 3, 1890.

In March, 1890, he delivered four lectures at the Royal Institution on "The early developments of the forms of instrumental music." His contributions to English periodical literature began in 1875, when there appeared in the Monthly Musical Record a "Letter on Chopin" and "On Mendelssohn and some of his critics," followed by other interesting articles. In 1879 he began to write for The Musical Times, to which he furnished several valuable essays. He is now putting the finishing touches to a book entitled "Modern Music: its nature and capacities," which will assuredly sustain his high reputation as a thoughtful and well informed writer on musical subjects.

SCHUMANN AND LISZT.

In the course of his varied career Professor Niecks has met many interesting and distinguished people. As a little boy he used to see Schumann at the musical performances at Düsseldorf and slowly walking in the park (the Hofgarten) with his lips pouted as if he were whistling, or pronouncing the letter O. His absorbed, absent-minded look is also a recollection. Liszt he visited in 1878 in order to get information for his Chopin biography. During the three days Niecks spent in Weimar he saw the illustrious master twice a day. At his first call the latter replied to his visitor's excuses for adding another to the many that bothered him: "This is quite different. We are friends." He probably alluded to notes on Liszt that Niecks had contributed to the programme books of Walter Bache's concerts in London. Liszt spoke with the greatest affection of his "dear pupil Bache, who sacrificed so much in making propaganda for his master's works." He was sceptical as to the success of the propaganda; thought it "a bad job." One afternoon when the master had a string quartet party he was as merry as a boy. Going from one to the other, joking, he at last sat down beside Niecks, and slapping the latter's knee, he exclaimed: "That is the sort of man I am!" Niecks's pleasantest memory of Liszt is his last meeting with him in the drawing-room, on a sunny Sunday afternoon, when the old master poured out to him intimate recollections of long ago, and now and then illustrated his words by snatches on the pianoforte.

RECOLLECTIONS OF BRAHMS.

Brahms, when Professor Niecks called upon him at Vienna, was smoking in his shirt sleeves. On the pianoforte was a full score of Bizet's "Djamileh." In reply to a remark of his visitor, suggesting surprise at seeing one of the piquant French composer's scores on the desk, the master said: "I have every score of Bizet's in my library; I like them very much." Brahms took his visitor twice to the Prater in order to see all the shows, the shooting galleries, and such like uncontrapuntalities. He was very fond of children and delighted in having a crowd of them round about him. He sat listening to a ladies' orchestra while they played dances and other non-serious music with as much attention as if he were listening to a Beethoven symphony. "Now I know from whence you get your inspiration," said Niecks. Brahms smiled. A Hungarian band (the genuine article) with their curious extemporizations greatly delighted Brahms, from whom the players would not accept any money.

PERSONALIA.

Professor Niecks became a naturalized Englishman in 1880. He received the degree of Doctor in Music at Trinity College, Dublin, in 1898. At the present time he is President of the Union of Graduates in Music. The wide reading, the highly cultured mind of the Reid Professor are reflected in his comprehensive library. It is not surprising to hear him say that Carlyle and Ruskin greatly influenced him in the early years of his settlement in this country. Here are books in various languages on æsthetics, psychology, philosophy, physiology, anatomy: the works of Herbert Spencer, Helmholtz, and other philosophers—in short, so extensive is the range of subjects in this fine collection that a minister who called on the Professor in his ante-professorial days in Dumfries asked him: "To whom does this library belong?" Professor Niecks modestly says, as he delights in showing his books, "They are my tools." Another anecdote may find a place here. Once at a party in Edinburgh an old lady said to Professor Niecks: "Are you musical?" He replied, with a smile: "Madam, you embarrass me. I can only say that if I am not, I ought to be."

The personality of the workman who uses these tools is no less delightful than is the extent of his encyclopædic knowledge and the simplicity of his life. To be the guest of Professor Niecks is to receive a mental fillip which is as stimulating as it is fragrant with the pleasantest associations. No more appropriate coda to this biographical symphony (if the designation may be allowed) could be furnished than by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who has kindly supplied the following appreciation of his old friend and colleague:—

AN APPRECIATION BY SIR A. C. MACKENZIE.

"It is something more than thirty-one years ago when I first met Frederick Niecks, over a string quartet, in his native town. None of us then guessed that the modest and retiring (like Von Moltke, silent in many tongues) viola player of our party would in later life so worthily occupy the Reid Chair of Music in my native city. But I have a vivid recollection of the occasion, or I would hardly remember even now that Schumann's A minor was one of our tasks. The accidental acquaintanceship was presently to lead to many future public performances together (some of them not without glints of humour—but this is "another story"), and, by fortunate chance for both of us, to ripen into the life-long friendship which has since continued unbroken.

"To the few who knew Niecks's character intimately in those days, it is not a matter of great surprise to find him now comfortably 'Chaired.' For his present honourable position has been won—apart from his gifts—by indomitable perseverance, an untamable appetite for study, and an imperturbable patience under, ofttimes, bleakish circumstances.

"Be that as it may; Edinburgh now has an energetic Professor, who has lived long enough in Scotland to know and appreciate the musical needs and requirements of his adopted country: as well as an actively practical musician, who can sympathise and work hand in hand with the members of his profession. And the obviously important and welcome results of such a wise choice are already within sight, and promise many more in the near future.

"Is not the man who can take his place at various desks in the orchestra, deliver erudite lectures, and write thoughtful books on music and her sons an ideal 'Professor'? Although, as regards learning and knowledge, far beyond the sphere of his own particular art, he has few equals, Niecks exhibits none of the attributes of a root-grubbing Smelfungus (a comprehensive and varied professional training in his youth precludes the possibility), but is an advanced, enthusiastic and receptive musician, presenting in his person the rare combination of wide culture with practical experience.

"Always accustomed to look upon him as the nearest approach to a philosopher that I have yet met in the flesh, I know I shall not offend my old friend by saying that my admiration for his accumulated wisdom is accentuated by the fact that he refrains from composing music himself. Rara avis!"

MUSIC IN THE SYNAGOGUE.

By the Rev. Francis L. Cohen.

Next to the Scriptural lessons, the most important section of each Jewish service, occurring even when no such lessons are read, is the sequence of benedictions known as the 'Amidah or Standing Prayer, from the attitude in which it is recited. It is a very ancient compilation, dating back to the days of Ezra and the very first synagogues, and being fixed in its present form since at least the second century. The Standing Prayer is that portion which, in the liturgy of the Dispersion, more immediately takes the place of the sacrifice offered on the same occasion in the ritual of the Temple. It is interesting to observe that in reminiscence of the days when books were scarce, this sequence of benedictions is first recited silently by individuals, and then (except at Evening Service) repeated aloud by the officiant, the Sanctus and the Levitical Benediction (in Hebrew of course) being introduced in the public repetition. It is preceded, morning and evening, by the reading of the Shema' or passage from Deuteronomy (vi., 4-9) commencing "Hear, O Israel," together with certain other Pentateuchal readings and some praises. All these it attracts, so to speak, to its own melody, a species of cantillation, not fixed by any system of accents, but consisting of a free vocal development on traditional lines of certain themes specifically associated with the particular Service or section of the Service.

THE PRAYER-MOTIVES.

According to this method, resembling the harmonia of the Greeks, or the use of the raga among the Hindus, a parallel form of intonation is associated with the corresponding passages in every service throughout the liturgical year, identical in style and practically so in treatment, but varying in tonality according to the occasion. The motives usually consist of a sort of coda, to which the benediction closing each paragraph is chanted. This prayer-motive or melody-type is technically spoken of as the Niggun or "melody" of the Service. In old Germany it was termed "Steiger," which shows that the scales and modal peculiarities of these motives were long ago recognised. The development of the motives, and the fixed melodies sometimes introduced as episodes, are together spoken of as Khazzanuth or "Precentory"—if that word may be coined. The modes of the prayer-motives have been stated above, and it will be noticed that they are not in every case diatonic.

CHROMATIC MODES.

By ancient tradition from the days when the Jews, now for ages settled in Teutonic and Slavonic lands, were under the same tonal influences as the peoples in South-Eastern Europe and Asia Minor still are, chromatic scales have been preserved. The chromatic intervals may have survived as a relic of the Oriental tendency to divide a tone into sub-intervals, and as a result of the intricacy of some of the vocal embroideries in use, which are of a character to amaze an ordinary singer. Among the Western precentors, born and bred as they are amid mensurate music on a contrapuntal basis, there is still a remarkable propensity to introduce the interval of the augmented second in and out of season, especially between the third and second degrees of any scale in a descending cadence. They even sometimes employ enharmonic intervals in rapid figuration, the pace of the Hebrew recitation, melismatic and syllabic alike, being much more rapid than that usually heard in church. Quite commonly two augmented seconds are introduced into the octave, as in this rather frequent form, much loved by all Oriental peoples—the beauty of which is especially apparent in descending passages.

FREE VOCAL FANTASIA.

The harmonia, or manner in which the prayer-motive will be developed, largely depends upon the custom of the place rather than on the importance of the celebration. Thus in the synagogues of the East-End, where persons born in countries where emotion is not so restrained as in England are to be found, a most elaborately melismatic chant will be preferred; while the British stolidity of a West-End congregation will keep the Precentor's impulsiveness perhaps too well under control. But, in all cases, it may be said that the officiant sings a vocal fantasia, from which a sense of devotion and reverence is never absent. The working-out of the traditional melody-type of the day is necessarily to a considerable extent left to the impulse of the moment, but depends much upon the structure, and, above all, the signification of the text. It must always work smoothly into the characteristic and well-defined coda on the words of the Berakhah, or doxological benediction closing the paragraph, which is considered as the "model." It may suffice to show in succession the prayer-motives of Morning Service on Sabbaths, Festivals, and Penitential Days (the last-named in a theoretical form), and then to illustrate how the first one of them would in practice be developed. To these the English of the original Hebrew may be added in elucidation of the treatment which the text receives.

It must be observed that the preceding is but one possible development among many, for while the main features will remain fairly constant, the detail will depend upon the capacity and "personal equation" of the particular officiant, his rapport with the congregants present, the strain on his voice due to the acoustic peculiarities of the building, the duration of the day's devotions, and other such varying conditions. But the development here given may be taken as a fair average, being, save for the modifications necessitated by the difference in rhythm between Hebrew and English, due to a master of renown.

FIXED MELODIES.

In addition to the antique forms of cantillation and free recitation discussed above, there are also a large number of fixed melodies which fall to the Jewish officiant during the course of his unaccompanied chanting. These reflect all the tonal fashions of the last eight centuries, according to the date of their introduction; but it may be generally stated that the more ancient are solo settings of particular texts, while the more recent include the chants, hymns, and versicles, usually to texts of mediæval origin, in which officiant and congregation (now led by the choir) take part antiphonally. There are two main classes of fixed solo melodies, which may be termed "refrains" and "doxologies." In these again is evident the working of the principle already mentioned, in accordance with which a particular mode is associated with a particular day in the liturgical year.

REPRESENTATIVE THEMES.

Owing to the tuneful individuality of these fixed melodies, they are often utilised as "representative themes" illustrative of the devotional thought underlying the celebrations of the day with which they are associated. The "refrains" are chiefly employed on the Festivals and special Sabbaths, on which occasions, according to most local uses, long Hebrew poems are appointed to be read through silently as meditations. The last stanza of each section of these poems is chanted by the officiant to the "refrain" of the day, which is also often used as an antiphonal chant when a sequence of Biblical verses introduces some special section of the office. It will suffice to quote two such "refrains" from the Penitential services, which, covering as they do the Day of Memorial (Lev. xxiii. 24, Num. xxix. 1) and the great Day of Atonement (Lev. xvi. 30; xxiii. 31, 32), are particularly rich in typical melodies of an antique character.

rouse, But 'tis a - lone high Heaven con-firms his vows. Ah! . . . .

Andantino.
O Thou . . . that hear - est prayer, all flesh shall come un - to Thee.

The other class, the "doxologies," are of greater liturgical importance, occurring as they do on every occasion of public worship. They are settings of the Kaddish, literally "Sanctification," the ancient text of which includes a prayer for the universal sanctification of the name of God, the coming of the Kingdom of Heaven in our days, and the Messianic peace. Formerly the Kaddish concluded each service, but it is now usually followed by a hymn. Yet at the end of each office the full form is always chanted, while the first half is regularly recited at the close of each distinct section of the devotions and study of the Law, which together make up the Jewish liturgy. The melodies of the Kaddish are accordingly regarded as most characteristic "representative themes," and are often used as such in anticipatory allusion to a coming sacred day. Some are almost monotone, the most frequent are syllabic; but those in use on the High Festivals are richly melismatic. Most of the melodies are of late mediæval origin, but still more recent accretions are often traceable. Yet underneath all is almost always discoverable the ancient Oriental melody-type, which was, perhaps unconsciously, in the mind of the officiant who first fixed the melody in the form in which tradition has preserved it during recent centuries.

THE ORDER OF SERVICE.

After the explanation which has been given of the forms of Jewish sacred song, some lucidity may attach to an exposition of the Order of Service on an ordinary Sabbath morning. With the sermon (in the vernacular of course), such a Saturday Service will occupy about two hours and a half. But it must not be imagined that one officiant is chanting all that time, although he may have to be singing for three or even four hours in succession on the Day of Atonement. The earlier portions of the Sabbath Service, being praises and Psalms, are chanted to "refrain" themes by an assistant. The chief Precentor then concludes the praises with an elaborate Introit and a doxology, and recites the closing verses of the Shema' and of the Benedictions to the Sabbath motive. The responses ("Blessed be His Name" and "Amen") are based on the same motive. Then follows the silent reading of the Standing Prayer, which the Precentor repeats at length, developing the Sabbath motive, with choral response. If it be New Moon, or a Festival, Hallel here follows, being Psalms cxiii. to cxviii. Some of the Psalms are read silently, others sung as chants or anthems (without any repetition of words) to modern compositions, and the first and last verses of Psalm cxviii. have traditional fixed melodies. Next comes a doxology, and then the Scroll of the Law is taken from the Ark. The versicles and processional at this point have modern choral settings. The Pentateuchal lesson is then cantillated from the Scroll, seven congregants being "called up" to the reading, which is usually the function of the Preacher or of the Assistant Reader. After a melodious rendering of the doxology, a member of the congregation is "called up" to cantillate the Prophetical lesson. The Scroll is then displayed to the people, rolled up, and re-invested with its silken cover and silver ornaments during the reading of this lesson from the pointed text of a printed volume. The Precentor now intones a blessing for the congregation, and the Preacher recites (usually in English) the Prayer for the Queen and Royal Family. Psalm cxlv. follows, and then Psalm xxix. is chanted while the Scroll is being returned to the Ark, the Precentor concluding the Morning Service with some versicles and a doxology. The "Additional" Service comes next, a Standing Prayer, again repeated with development of the day's motive; then follows the sermon, after it a metrical hymn, a brief prayer, a doxology, and a final hymn. These hymns, it must be noted, are identical week after week. On Festivals, the Service is much the same in outline, but the prayer-motives and the choral compositions are different. In the penitential season, on the Day of Memorial, the Service is greatly protracted, taking from four to six hours; and on the Day of Atonement it occupies the whole day. On these occasions the ritual is divided between at least two officiants, but it is rendered still on the same lines of melody-type and of motive development. But in the repetition of the Standing Prayers many meditations and poems are introduced, and many of them are chanted at length, a few with choral response. Even if the emotional strain of the sacred occasion do not call forth greater elaboration of the development, the many fixed melodies, such as the Kol Nidrei, well known through Bruch's transcription, in themselves constitute an arduous task for the officiant. In illustration of the height of expression and intensity to which his song on that solemn occasion sometimes rises, this article may conclude with the transcription of a traditional rhapsody, replete with an emotion often transcending mere verbal utterance, which is introduced in the recital of the "Additional" Service on the Day of Atonement.

HANS VON BÜLOW IN HIS LETTERS.*

Under the above heading we had the pleasure of calling attention, in The Musical Times for March and April, 1896, to two volumes of Von Bülow's letters, which were penned during the period 1841-54. Similarly, in February and March, 1897, under the heading "Hans von Bülow in his Writings," we spoke about a volume of his literary essays extending over the period 1850-92. We have now to turn our thoughts to a further volume of 240 letters, ranging from 1855 to 1864.

These "collected writings" have been issued under the editorship of Bülow's widow, the Baroness Marie von Bülow, who seems to be devoting her life to amassing and publishing all that her late husband ever wrote, either in the way of letters to personal friends or as contributions to musical periodicals.

The same consistent system has been employed in the present as in the previous volumes. The letters are grouped in chronological order, and are sometimes prefaced and sometimes supplemented by explanatory notes of the circumstances and situations under which they were written. When, as often happens, gaps occur in Bülow's correspondence, these are filled up by extracts from letters written by his mother to her daughter, by the Princess Wittgenstein (Liszt's friend), and others, which treat of his doings and condition at the time. By this means, as far as possible, it has been sought to furnish a continuous biography of his career. Incomplete though this necessarily must be, it serves to throw light upon much that had previously been kept in the dark.

At the end of the second volume of Bülow's Letters (1855) we found him just established in Berlin as a professor at Dr. Marx's Musical Conservatory, and here we find him again a few months later at the commencement of the volume under notice. It was now that he started upon what he subsequently termed "his slavery in Berlin, the Metropolis of Sand"—otherwise called "Philistropolis"—terms of expression which were fully justified by the fact that, like many others, he had to devote himself to tuition and quill-driving for the press in order to secure a maintenance, rather than, as he would have preferred, to musical composition and the life of a pianiste ambulant. With what conscientiousness he devoted himself to his pedagogic duties is made fully apparent by a detailed "Report" of the progress of his pupils which prefaces this volume, and which he furnished at the close of his first term at Dr. Marx's Conservatory. As a model of what such a document should be at music-teaching establishments, where such a practice obtains, nothing could be more exemplary. That throughout his life, following in the wake of his master, Liszt, the saying that a lesson from Bülow was worth two from anyone else is no exaggeration.

Dissatisfied as Bülow was with his position in Berlin, and opposed as he was by those who condemned the propaganda he was determined to make on behalf of Berlioz, Liszt, Wagner, and some still newer lights, he did excellent work, in the way of instituting, with the eminent violinist, Laub, classical chamber-music concerts, and occasionally had opportunities of playing at, and conducting, the orchestral concerts established in Berlin by Julius Stern, at which he introduced such modern works as the "Tannhäuser" Overture, &c.

It is interesting to note that on advocating the claims of Raff and Rubinstein at this early date he also included those of Brahms; a fact which entirely dispels the silly notion, which at a much later date was entertained, that Bülow during his Meiningen period only took up with Brahms in order to annoy Wagner, from whom circumstances had estranged him. Nothing could be more false than this. Putting art before domesticity, Bülow, to his life's end, always did his best to support Wagner, by giving concerts in behalf of, and largely contributing to, the Bayreuth scheme.

The present instalment of Bülow's letters is for the most part addressed to his professional musical colleagues, among the most noted of whom should be specified: J. Stern, J. Raff, R. Pohl, H. von Bronsart, F. Draeseke, H. Dorn, L. Köhler, P. Cornelius, L. A. Zellner, F. Brendel, A. Ritter, F. and Frau von Milde, E. Lassen, B. Cossmann, A. Jensen, F. Kiel, A. Schmitt, F. Hartvigson, G. Goltermann, F. Wieck, and A. Henselt. This list might easily be extended by reference to letters of a more intimate character which passed between Bülow and the Princess Wittgenstein, Frau Jessie Laussot (an Englishwoman residing in Florence, where she founded a "Cherubini Society," which Bülow conducted during a lengthened stay there), and others.

In reading published letters one always has a longing to know what were the circumstances which gave rise to them, and what were the replies which they evoked. In the present instance this longing is to some extent satisfied by an interchange being furnished of some of the letters which passed between Bülow and several of his correspondents—e.g., his mother, the Princess Wittgenstein, Berlioz, F. Lassalle, L. Bucher, and others.

The following particulars of Bülow's early life are abridged from a letter (unaddressed) in the possession of Frau Marie Huch (geb. Gerstäcker) in Dresden. Writing in 1858, he says:—

"I was born January 8, 1830 (at Dresden). My father, Freiherr Eduard von Bülow (a friend of L. Tieck's), was Chamberlain at the Court of Dessau and a distinguished author.

* Hans von Bülow, Briefe und Schreiben. Band IV. Briefe von Hans von Bülow herausgegeben von Marie von Bülow. Leipzig: Breitkopf und Härtel. 1899.

In 1850 he separated from his wife and married the Countess Luise Bülow-Dennewitz. I received my earliest musical instruction in 1839, when, after a long illness, I first evinced a taste for music. The rapid progress I made led to the wish that I should enter the Leipzig Conservatory of Music, an idea which fortunately was given up. During 1846-48 I studied at the Gymnasium in Stuttgart with a view to entering the Leipzig University, which I did as a law student, at Easter, 1848. In 1849-50 I continued my studies in Berlin. It was now that music got the upper hand, and that, against the wishes of my parents, especially my mother, I betook myself to Wagner at Zürich. He strenuously backed me up in my determination to make music my profession, and during the winter of 1850-51 furnished me with opportunities of learning the art of conducting at the Zürich Theatre. Having compromised matters with my parents, I went to Weimar in June, 1851, in order, under Liszt's guidance, to equip myself for the career of a virtuoso. During 1844-46, while living with my parents in Dresden, I had already had composition lessons from that clever teacher, Max Karl Eberwein, and during my stay at the Leipzig University had been under Hauptmann's tuition. In February, 1853, I left Weimar with the view of appearing in public as a pianist. First I was heard in Vienna and afterwards in Hungary. In the autumn of this year I had the good fortune to make my name known in Germany proper at the Carlsruhe Musical Festival, conducted by Liszt. From this time till April, 1855, I was engaged in touring, and appeared at Hamburg, Bremen, Hannover, Dresden, Breslau, Posen, Danzig, &c., but spent the intervals with my mother in Dresden. It was in December, 1853, that I made my first appearance in Berlin. In April, 1855, I entered upon my duties as pianoforte teacher at the Marx-Stern Conservatory, and succeeded to the post vacated by Dr. Kullak; and this I still held when, on Dr. Marx's retirement, the Conservatory was taken over by music-director Stern.

"The names of artists to whom, musically, I am deeply indebted are very numerous. Before all, in every department of musical art, my gratitude is due to my present father-in-law, Franz Liszt, whose youngest daughter, Cosima Liszt, born at Como in 1837, I married on August 18, 1857, after having been naturalised as a Prussian subject. Further, I have to thank Richard Wagner, who, in 1848, at Dresden, had already warmly befriended me. Then Berlioz, in Paris, whose acquaintance I had made at Dresden in 1845. It was these three men who, properly speaking, made me a musician—through them I also made acquaintance with, and learnt to love, the treasures of the past.

"For the first training that I received in my so-called specialty I have to thank Fräulein Schmiedel, a talented pianoforte teacher, who died at an early age. Litolff, too, whom in 1844-5 I saw and heard nearly every day in my parents' house, also exercised a healthy influence over me; and still more is due to the regular and excellent instruction which I received from Fr. Wieck, the father of Clara Schumann. In Stuttgart (1846-48), owing to the want of encouragement, I made little progress. Nevertheless, it was there that as an amateur I made my first appearance in public as the exponent of Mendelssohn's Concerto in D minor and a Fantasia by Raff. The years 1848-50 contributed little towards my outward development beyond making me feel still more dissatisfied with my prospects, and confirming me in my desire to devote myself exclusively to music. Further, they brought it to my comprehension that at best I should have made but a sorry lawyer.

"On my tours as a virtuoso, which I hope to take up again, I can only so far look with satisfaction. Bach, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Chopin, Schumann, and Franz Liszt have hitherto formed the staple of my programmes. Bad salon-pieces I have never cultivated, though now and then, owing to the exigencies of politeness, I have had to succumb to respectable mediocrities. The most splendid success that I have yet had as a pianist was last year in Leipzig, where, on account of my musical criticisms, I am, if possible, even more detested than in Berlin, and where for five years the doors of the Gewandhaus were closed against me, notwithstanding the strenuous efforts made by Ferd. David in my favour. Of my doings in Berlin I have nothing further to tell that you do not already know. I am, however, proud to be able to say that I know no one here to whom I feel indebted in any way for my artistic improvement or anything else. Except for the gracious patronage of the Princess of Prussia, which my father-in-law obtained for me, I can recall little that has been gratifying or encouraging. But in some ways I feel myself indebted to many people, inasmuch as I cannot but regard my (last) three years' stay here as likely to prove beneficial to my further development. The relationship which existed between my colleagues in Berlin and myself, with few exceptions, I can only describe as having been what it should have been on my part. A single remark I must allow myself. This refers to the calumnies which were brought up against me as a 'contemner' (!) of the greatest tone-masters of all times. Bach and Beethoven have always engrossed my most serious attention. It is possible that my performance of their works failed sufficiently to reproduce their spirit, and that my enthusiasm for these 'eternals' was not fully reflected. Such an expression of opinion I could not accept either from the public or from the critics, but only from my peers—i.e., those who are as familiar with classical works and know them as well by heart as I do. The performance of operas by Gluck and Mozart, as well as of Beethoven's Symphonies, under Wagner's direction in Dresden, are to be classed among the most satisfactory of my musical reminiscences. They made the deepest impression upon me, and I can recall no such finished performances of a later date.

"Of my compositions I have yet published but a few. Among the best I count some orchestral pieces which still remain in manuscript. My critical essays, which during 1852-6 I contributed to various papers, I look forward to sifting and issuing in a volume. Unhesitatingly I justify my activity in this direction as a proof of my conviction that Wagner, Liszt, and Berlioz represent the culminating point of the modern development of music."

Among the greatest feats of Bülow's life was unquestionably the provision of the pianoforte score of Wagner's "Tristan und Isolde." Of all the arrangements of Wagner's music-dramas—by Klindworth ("Der Ring"), Tausig ("Die Meistersinger," to which by-the-bye Bülow arranged the Overture), and Joseph Rubinstein ("Parsifal"), from a pianistic point of view, that of "Tristan" stands facile princeps. But with a work which, as to its musical material and its instrumentation, was absolutely new and unprecedented, think what trouble it must have cost him! In a letter of August 20, 1859, he writes to Hans von Bronsart: "I sweat the whole day long over the pianoforte score of Wagner's 'Tristan'—most remarkable music, grandiose, but as unpianistic as anything of Berlioz. How I regret that you are not here to advise me! There is often far too much for a single head to grub out!" And four days later he writes to the same: "I am still working like a galley slave at the pianoforte score of 'Tristan'; both the publisher and composer enormously press me for its completion, as it is to be brought out at Carlsruhe in October next." (It was not, however, destined to be heard in public until June 10, 1865, when it was produced at Munich under Bülow's direction.)

In a letter of 1859, addressed to Franz Brendel, Bülow thus sums up his estimate of "Tristan." He writes: "With the appearance of 'Tristan und Isolde' the New German School has entered upon an entirely new phase. Though the 'Ring des Niebelungen' at present remains in Wagner's desk, this one-evening opera takes its place. Here we find the realisation of Wagner's tendencies, and in quite an unexpected manner. No one had anticipated such music from Wagner. It joins on directly with the latest Beethoven—has no analogy to Weber or Gluck. 'Tristan' stands in the same relationship to 'Lohengrin' as 'Fidelio' does to the 'Entführung aus dem Serail,' as the C sharp minor Quartet does to the first Quartet in F (Op. 18). I declare that I have gone from one rapturous surprise to another. The musician who does not yet believe in this progress has no ears. At all points Wagner is convincing by his mighty and purely musical knowledge. Of its architectonic, its musical details, you cannot form too high a conception. In invention 'Tristan' is Wagner's most powerful work. There is nothing so elevating as its second act. I have had experiences of the feelings of musicians, not specially belonging to our party, to whom I have played extracts. One was almost speechless with astonishment: 'Never had I expected anything of this kind from Wagner—that is by far the most beautiful that he has written—he has reached here the highest ideal that the present can think of.' Since the birth of 'Tristan' there are only two parties—those who have learnt something and those who have learnt nothing. He whom this opera does not convert has no music within him. Such rich, clear, and original polyphony is rarely to be found in earlier scores. You know me too well to suspect that I have given way to exaggerated enthusiasm; you know that my heart is moved to animation only after obeying the dictates of my brain. In this present instance my brain has unconditionally given its assent. 'Tristan und Isolde' can hardly become popular, but no poetically gifted amateur will fail to recognise the sublimity and power of genius which are manifested in this work. Apart from all other considerations, I assure you that this opera represents the culminating point of musical art up to this time."

It would be easy to go on quoting ad infinitum passages from these letters which would turn out to be interesting to the general musical reader as well as to the "perfect Wagnerite," the devotees of Liszt, and the four "B's"—Bach, Beethoven, Berlioz, and Brahms, to whom might be added a fifth—viz., Bülow. They are almost invariably cleverly and wittily expressed, though it must be admitted that they are sometimes of a cryptic character.

Much as one must admire Bülow's widow's devotion in bringing to light all that she can lay hands on of her husband's writings, both public and private, one cannot but feel that a judicious selection of his letters and critiques would have served her purpose of doing honour to his memory equally well. The three volumes already issued cover about one-half of Bülow's artistic career; to complete the remaining half, at least another three volumes will probably be required, and even then we shall have to put up with an important gap, as obviously the letters which passed between Bülow and his first wife will not be made available. We recall that on an English version of Bülow's first two volumes of his letters being called for, the publisher (T. Fisher Unwin) wisely insisted upon its being reduced to a selection, which was judiciously supplied and translated by Miss Constance Bache, who, it is to be hoped, will be induced to subject the new volume to similar treatment.

This notice should not be brought to a close without drawing attention to the fact that the interchange of correspondence which passed between Liszt and Bülow has also recently been issued in French, under the editorship of La Mara, by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of Leipzig. Will not this also be followed up by an English version? C. A. B.

THE ORGAN RECITAL.

A CONTRIBUTION TOWARDS ITS HISTORY.

The fast-ebbing century will leave behind it the organ recital. One hundred years ago the organ was not an organ in the sense that we now know the instrument. Then it was pedal-pipeless and its compass was "all wrong." The great organists of the time, like Dr. Worgan, were dexterous enough with the manuals—the pedals they knew not.

First, however, a few words in regard to the organ itself. Pedals, although introduced in Germany four hundred years ago, were unknown in this country until 1790, and then they merely pulled down the manual keys. But in 1793 Avery added "an octave of unison wood GG pedal pipes" to the organ of Westminster Abbey. In 1811 a compass of 1½ octave of pedals (and pipes) can be traced, in 1829 25 notes are recorded, and so on until the compass of the pedal board was gradually extended to its present dimensions. But it was not until about the year 1840 that the C compass began to be adopted in England. The G compass had hitherto prevailed, but there were exceptions, one of the most notable being the fine old organ in St. Paul's Cathedral, which had a manual compass extending down to CCC. It is obvious that the mighty masterpieces of Bach could not be played on those old G organs; nevertheless some organists tenaciously clung to the non-C compass, amongst them being the late Dr. S. S. Wesley and Sir George Elvey. Wesley wished to have the compass to both manuals and pedals to G in the organ in St. George's Hall, Liverpool, which he designed; but although he gave way in regard to a C pedal-board, he insisted upon the manuals being taken to G, and thus they remained, all through Best's régime, until two years ago, when they were changed to C. At St. George's Chapel, Windsor, both manual and pedal compass remained at F throughout Elvey's organistship—in fact, until 1882, when Sir Walter Parratt, upon his appointment, had the compass changed to C, whereby he was enabled to play his dearly beloved Bach.

In the last century English organ music was invariably written only on two staves. It is a little hazardous to state definitely when our native composers began to use three staves, but an early instance may be found in Book II. of "Twelve Voluntaries, for the organ or pianoforte," by William Russell, organist of the Foundling Hospital, and dedicated to the Governors of that Institution. These voluntaries were published in 1812, and the separate pedal stave is to be found in Nos. 2 and 11 of the set.

Then in regard to the oft-used term "recital"—a term which is now applied to all sorts and conditions of performances upon divers instruments, including the vox humana. The designation "recital"—though in a pluralised form—was first used in this country by Franz Liszt in 1840. "M. Liszt will give . . . recitals on the pianoforte of the following different works," so ran the advertisements of the great pianist's performances at the Hanover Square Rooms—performances which the leading musical journal of the day described as a "curious exhibition." It is said that the designation "recital," or "recitals," was originally suggested by the late Mr. Frederick Beale, of the firm of Cramer and Co., Liszt's agents. It is certain, however, that the term did not immediately come into general use. Twenty-one years later (in 1861), when Charles Hallé initiated his excellent series of Beethoven Recitals, the advertisements, although headed "Mr. Chas. Hallé's Beethoven Recitals," referred to them as "performances." As to the time when the word "recital" was first used in connection with an organ performance, this is beyond our knowledge. Will some of our well-informed readers kindly furnish us with any information they may possess on this point? In the meantime we can trace the use of the term "organ recital" at the opening of the organ, by W. T. Best, in Union Chapel, Islington, on December 4, 1867, as is proved by a copy of the original programme now before us. It may be assumed, therefore, that for the greater part of the century the term "organ performance" was invariably adopted, and that "recital" began to be used in "about the sixties."

Who was the first to give organ recitals in the modern sense of the term? Was it not Benjamin Jacob? This meritorious musician (1778-1829) was organist of Surrey Chapel, Blackfriars Road, London, of which the celebrated and eccentric preacher, the Rev. Rowland Hill, was the minister. Jacob was a friend of Samuel Wesley, who enlisted him in the Bach crusade which he ("old Sam") had so much at heart. Jacob, apparently upon his own initiative, instituted a series of organ performances in Surrey Chapel in the years 1811-14, even if not earlier than 1811. Wesley has left a very interesting record of these performances in the following words, transcribed from his own "pot hooks and hangers":—

> The latter of these excellent organists [Benjamin Jacob] planned with me a selection from the works of Bach and Handel as a matter of a grand morning performance at Surrey Chapel with the consent and approbation of the late Rev. Rowland Hill.

Among the organ pieces were inserted two of Bach's beautiful and brilliant sonatas with a violin accompaniment. I had been a fine performer on that instrument many years before, but had long disused it. However on the present occasion I resolved on resuming it, and accordingly set to practise these pieces so as to be completely qualified for a public performance of them.

Mr. Jacob caused a list of every article to be printed and circulated in every quarter where the tickets of admission were deposited, and as the performance was entirely gratuitous, the invitations were readily enough accepted.

The chapel was very numerously attended and the performance occupied, to the best of my recollection, from three to four hours. The whole was executed with accuracy and precision, and the hearers professed themselves universally gratified and satisfied with every portion of it.

Wesley thus supplies us with some curious information in regard to these recitals. Although they commenced at eleven o'clock in the morning, the performances, which lasted three or four hours, attracted large audiences. Programmes seem to have been somewhat of a novelty, admission was free, and—there was no collection!

Then as to the programmes. Fortunately two or three of them have been preserved, though not one in which Wesley's name appears as a fiddler. The following, when Jacob had the co-operation of Dr. Crotch and J. P. Salomon (Haydn's friend), may serve as a specimen of these organic music-makings held in Surrey Chapel at the beginning of the century. Here is the "list of every article," to adopt Wesley's definition:—

By permission of the Rev. Rowland Hill, A.M.

On Thursday, May 21, 1812, MR. JACOB, organist of Surrey Chapel, intends giving a performance on the organ at the above chapel, Blackfriars Road, when Dr. CROTCH, Professor of Music in the University of Oxford, will perform with him a Selection of Music from the works of various eminent authors.

In the course of the performance Two Sonatas of SEBASTIAN BACH will be introduced, and accompanied on the violin by Mr. SALOMON.

To begin at eleven o'clock precisely.

There can be no admission without Tickets; and no more will be admitted with each Ticket than the number specified thereon.

[Abbreviations (to save space): C. = Dr. Crotch. J. = Mr. Jacob. S. = Mr. Salomon.]

THE END.

This programme speaks for itself, especially its prodigious length. But there are one or two features that call for special remark. First, the "Prelude and Fugue in E flat, 3 flats," is probably our dear old friend the "St. Ann's," then almost unknown, and of which Jacob made a four-hand arrangement. The other Bach fugue was doubtless from the "48." The Bach violin sonatas must have been novelties, or nearly so. Handel's "Hallelujah," as a duet, is sure to have made its mark, and, as showing that Jacob was before his time, he introduced an "Imitation of a thunder storm (Extempore)"!

The Surrey Chapel organ at that time consisted of two manuals and an octave of pedal pipes. The Great (GG to F) had eleven stops (including two open diapasons and two trumpets), but the small (37 notes, from F) had only five stops; there were also "two shifting movements"—in other words, composition pedals. Hughson, in his "History of London" (1807), thus describes the instrument: "The Surrey Chapel organ, by Elliott, is particularly noticed for its sweetness of tone as well as for its extensive powers, which are so great, that in one of the hymns descriptive of thunder, many of the audience have fainted!"

The clergy did not always regard organ recitals with the same favour as they do now. In November, 1829, the Bishop of London forbade an organ performance that Wesley, Adams, and the elder Cooper were announced to give at St. Sepulchre's Church, Holborn Viaduct, in aid of the parochial girls' school. Possibly this injunction of the Bishop was due to the fact that a charge for admission into the church was to have been made. The Atlas, an important periodical of the time, in an emphatic protest against the Bishop's interdict, said:—

> The little use to which many fine instruments in the parish churches of London are put, is a subject of regret; they stand in their solitude with keys untouched, from week to week, and on Sundays fulfil their poor duty ot accompanying a Psalm.

A similar prohibition took place seventeen years later when S. S. Wesley opened Walker's new organ in Tavistock Church. Although the "good Bishop" (of Exeter) did not disapprove of a collection after the performance, "a piece objected to by the Bishop was omitted"! Poor Wesley! Was it his favourite overture to "Jessonda"?

Josiah Pittman (1816-1886) is a name almost forgotten by the present generation of organists, but sixty years ago he was one of the pioneers in the playing of Bach's organ fugues, "grievously difficult to execute," according to the following interesting report from the Musical World of June 2, 1837:—

Christchurch, Spitalfields.—On Monday evening, Mr. Pittman, the newly elected organist of this church, presided at the performance on the organ, with the view of affording the parishioners an opportunity of hearing their fine instrument in its improved state. As the repairs had been effected by means of a voluntary, but spirited subscription, the performance was but a proper compliment to those who so cheerfully had come forward in the good cause. Upwards of two thousand persons were assembled on this occasion, and the new organist (who is yet but a stripling) had undertaken no ordinary task in the assembling of so large and respectable an auditory to listen to a strictly instrumental performance, without the attraction of even a single vocalist. The programme embraced the two pedal fugues by Sebastian Bach, in G minor and E major (both grievously difficult to execute), two choruses from the oratorios of Handel and Haydn, interspersed with the beautiful slow movements from Beethoven's Sinfonias in D and C minor, and the Andantes from some of Beethoven's and Spohr's quartets. There was also a sprinkling from Cherubini, the overture from the "St. Paul" of Mendelssohn, and the last two movements of the "Jupiter" Sinfonia, by Mozart. It was a novel sight to witness so numerous a congregation sitting out, with evident gratification and delight, a long series of classical movements, many of which are rarely heard out of the Philharmonic Concert Room; and the fugues of Bach, in all probability, for the first time. It will be evident from the selection brought forward on this occasion, that the inhabitants of Christchurch are fortunate in their organist, and that the judgment evinced by Mr. Novello in selecting him as the first performer out of the gross number of candidates, was both sound and unimpeachable. Mr. Pittman's performance was unexceptionably excellent, and his skill and taste reflect high credit on Mr. Gauntlett, who, we believe, directed his studies on the organ. The Andante movements of Beethoven are tremendously difficult to make effective on the organ, and we do Mr. Pittman no more than justice to say these elegant compositions formed the great charm of his performance. Mr. Lincoln, jun. (a pupil of Mr. Adams), assisted in the execution of the overture to "St. Paul" and the "Jupiter" Symphony, and is a sound and skilful organ performer.

Lady organists will doubtless be specially interested in the achievements of one of their sex in the year of the Queen's Accession. The name of this remarkable player is Elizabeth Stirling (1819-1895). She is best known as the composer of "All among the barley," but in her teens Miss Stirling was all among the pedals. Here is an extract from the Musical World of August 25, 1837, recording the pedalistic performances of the young lady:—

Organ Performance.—On Thursday in last week, a very interesting selection from the works of Sebastian Bach, with some other Organ Music, was given at St. Katherine's Church in the Regent's Park, for the purpose of affording an opportunity to several connoisseurs of judging of the extraordinary talent of a lady, Miss Stirling, whose name, at present chiefly known to the è secretioribus of the profession, is likely to become associated with ideas of whatever is great and masterly in the difficult art of organ playing. This young lady, who we believe is little more than eighteen years of age, was the unceasing object of general astonishment, and performed for nearly three hours in continuation the most difficult pedal fugues and preludes of Bach, with a degree of precision and mastery, which may almost be said to be unrivalled. We hope to see justice done to Miss Stirling. The prejudice against lady organists cannot remain, with such an example opposed to it. Mr. Holmes, the Organist of Poplar Church, has hitherto conducted the musical study and taste of Miss Stirling; with how much credit to himself, every auditor on Thursday week can amply testify.

Returning to the doings of mere man we find a very remarkable organist in the person of Thomas Adams (1785-1858). "He is unquestionably the Thalberg of the organ; and yet his mechanical powers of execution are absorbed by his almost incredible knowledge of harmony and the resources of intricate counterpoint. M. Thalberg, at the request of the company, gave Mr. Adams a subject to extemporize on, and no one appeared more astonished and delighted at the masterly manner in which it was treated than the great pianist himself. M. Thalberg, as usual, enchanted the circle by prodigies of execution: and each manifested unusual exuberance of fancy and genius."—(Musical World, July 14, 1837.)

From a bundle of old programmes of organ performances, dating from 1843 onwards, we extract the following of a typical Thomas Adams selection, as played by him at Messrs. Gray and Davison's factory on the "grand organ" for Calcutta Cathedral, September 9, 1845:—

Part I.

1.	Extempore
2.	Duet from "The Interrupted Sacrifice"	Winter.
3.	Part of the First Motet	Seb. Bach.
	Chorus, "Sing to the Lord"	Haydn.
4.	Duet, "Deh prendi un dolce amplesso"	Mozart.
	Air, "Non più andrai"
5.	Extempore
6.	Overture	Adams.

Part II.

1.	"Adeste Fideles," with Variations	Adams.
2.	Overture, "Don Giovanni"	Mozart.
3.	Chorus, "When his loud voice"	Handel.
4.	Extempore
5	Vintagers' Chorus (from "The Seasons")	Haydn.
6.	Coronation Anthem, "Zadok the Priest"	Handel.

The designation "Extempore" figures largely in the programmes of Thomas Adams, he being an exceedingly clever improvisator. His Overture in the foregoing programme is doubtless that in C (No. 54 of Vincent Novello's "select organ pieces"), which has been played in recent years by Sir Walter Parratt. Wherever he went Adams always achieved great success by his masterly performances on the king of instruments. Here is an account of his playing at Leeds in January, 1838: "Mr. Adams performed on Monday last on our new organ in Oxford Place Chapel [Wesleyan] at twelve o'clock to a highly respectable audience, composed of all classes—Churchmen, Dissenters, Methodists, Roman Catholics, and Quakers. He gave us the overture to Zauberflöte, the Harmonious Blacksmith, Luther's Hymn, Rule Britannia, God save the Queen, &c."

The absence of Bach's organ fugues from the programmes of Thomas Adams may be accounted for by the fact that he belonged to the G organ school. In a letter to the present writer, dated September 15, 1894, the late Mr. W. T. Best thus characteristically expressed his opinion upon Adams's organ playing. "Adams, with enormous contrapuntal talent, regaled himself by serving up one or two of Bach's '48' fugues, adding a droning pedal note when his bunions were propitious."

The name of Samuel Sebastian Wesley must not be omitted even in the briefest survey of organ recitals. Here is a programme of a performance given by him in St. Mary's Church, St. George's-in-the-East, June 25, 1852, on the new organ built by "Father" Willis:—

PART I.
Fugue, E flat	Seb. Bach.
Song, "Holy, holy" Chorus, "Hallelujah"	Handel.
Andante	Mozart.
Chorus, "The arm of the Lord"	Haydn.
Air (by Kozeluch), varied	S. S. Wesley.
Instrumental piece	Spohr.
PART II.
Air, varied (from Organ pieces, set 2nd)	S. S. Wesley.
Prelude and Fugue	Bach.
Air	Mendelssohn.
Andante	S. S. Wesley.
Extemporaneous	S. S. Wesley.
Grand Chorus.

The meagre titles of the pieces are somewhat tantalising. Is it not in the highest degree probable, however, that the vague title "Instrumental piece—Spohr" was the Overture to "Jessonda"? Wesley had experienced the vetoing by a Bishop of a piece in his programme at Tavistock six years before, and in all probability he did not want to run the risk of being similarly treated by the Bishop of London. Hence "Instrumental piece."

Here, for the present, we must leave the subject in the hope of returning to it again at some future time, should its further development be of sufficient interest to our readers.

THE "Dictionary of National Biography" has now entered upon the twenty-third letter of the alphabet. As X will doubtless be a negative quantity, and with a probable paucity of clever folk even amongst the Y Zs, the consummation of this great enterprise is nearing its attainment. The two volumes (58 and 59) issued since our last notice do not contain the lives of any specially eminent musicians; but it is a commendable characteristic of this work to include notices of those who are not front rank celebrities. The catholicity of the "Dictionary" is shown in a biography of "Vance," the music-hall singer of "Jolly dogs" fame, whose real name was Alfred Peck Stevens. The tenor soloist in the first performance of Beethoven's Choral Symphony, Thomas Vaughan, deservedly finds a place. Formerly a Norwich chorister, he reigned supreme in the tenor field until he was superseded by Braham. We learn that he was "a typical faultless singer of the English school, perfected by the study of oratorio music." Vaughan is buried in the West Cloister of Westminster Abbey. William Litton Viner, the organist of Penzance, has a short notice with a corrected date (wrongly given in previous biographies) of his appointment to St. Mary's Chapelry. Joseph Augustine Wade was one of the harmonizers, with Crotch and Macfarren, of the tunes in Chappell's "Popular Music of the olden time." The original title of the book (dated 1840) was, however, "a collection of National English airs, consisting of ancient song, ballad, and dance tunes, interspersed with remarks and anecdote, &c." Wade was a ne'er-do-well. His character is thus summarised by one who knew him intimately: "A wise man in theory and a fool in practice. A vigorous intellect; planning everything, performing nothing. Always in difficulties, having the means at hand to extricate himself from their annoyance, yet too apathetic to arouse himself to an effort; content to dream away his time in any occupation but that which the requisition of the occasion demanded." The same might be written of many another clever man, whose worst enemy is himself.

A SPECIALLY gifted amateur is noticed in the biography of Simon Waley Waley, who, in addition to his remarkable musicianship, was a highly cultured man with a delightful personality. There is nothing strikingly new in the biography of Vincent Wallace, except the statement that his compositions fill 100 pages of the British Museum Catalogue. The information that in a former biography of the composer "Rimbault errs in most of his dates," is not altogether surprising. The two Walmisleys, father and son, are naturally included. The elder, Thomas Forbes Walmisley, composed fifty-nine glees and Dr. E. J. Hopkins was his most distinguished pupil. Thomas Attwood Walmisley could scarcely regard Sunday as a day of rest. During a portion of his Cambridge period he played at no less than eight services on that day—the first was at 7.15 a.m., the last at 6.15 p.m. He introduced into the organ of Trinity College Chapel "a melody coupler, the first of its kind ever made: this movement acts upon the two upper octaves of the choir organ, thus enabling the performer to play melodies with his feet." Had his life been prolonged—he died at the age of forty-two—Walmisley might have obtained a very high place on the roll of English church composers. One of the very "old boys" amongst musicians is Walter of Evesham, or Walter Oddington, who flourished in 1320. The "Dictionary" tells us that "Walter de Evesham has very frequently been confounded with Walter de Einesham, a monk of Canterbury, who was chosen by the monks (but not appointed) Archbishop of Canterbury in 1228. The mistake was first made by Bale, who has been copied by Holinshed, Hawkins, Tanner, Burney, Tindal, Kiesewetter, Fétis, and many others." See how these historians copy one another!

THE Library of the British Museum has just had the good fortune to acquire a hitherto unknown collection of madrigals, which contains three new compositions by Palestrina. The work in question (undescribed by either Eitner or Vogel) is entitled—

> Il Terzo Libro delle Muse a Quattro Voci. Madrigali Ariosi, da diversi eccell. Musici raccolti, et dati in luce. In Roma appresso Antonio Barré, M.D. LXII.

It is dedicated by the printer to Don Indico Piccolomini, and contains thirty-five madrigals by Cyprian de Rore, A. Barré, A. Zoilo, F. Rossello,

A. Maresio, F. di Monte, S. Lando, Domenico di Nola, V. Ruffo, F. Baratto, Palestrina, Lerma, Orlando di Lasso, and L. Agostini. The first and second collections of four-part madrigals, published by Barré under this title, appeared respectively in 1555 and 1558 and passed through various editions, which will be found described in Dr. Vogel's excellent bibliography. The second book contains several early compositions of Palestrina's, which have been reprinted in Vol. XXX. of Breitkopf and Härtel's complete edition; but the existence of the third book was quite unknown until the British Museum copy was acquired. The newly recovered madrigals of Palestrina contained in it are as follows:—"Da poi ch' io viddi" ("Gio. Pier Luigi da Pallestrina"), "Perch' al viso d' amor" ("Io. Pier Luigi"), and "Qual piu crudel martire" ("Gio. Pier Luigi da Pallestrina"). Unfortunately the Museum only possesses the tenor and bass parts, but these will appear in the concluding volume of the complete edition, now being prepared for the press by Dr. Haberl.

Thomas Adams, to whom reference is made in the article on "The Organ Recital," was one of those old organists who evidently favoured the diatonic school of church music. It was probably some chromatical high jinks of the young bloods that prompted Adams, sixty-two years ago, to indite the following:—

The 100th Psalm, harmonized on the principles of the "Dandy Sublime," and dedicated, with every appropriate feeling, to those "profound musicians" who consider bold progressions and daring harmonies—in plain English, unnatural modulations and extravagant discords—as the only tests of fine composition, by

THOMAS ADAMS.

"I do not give you to posterity as a pattern to imitate, but as an example to deter."—Junius to the Duke of Grafton.

"Points with points, periods with periods jar,
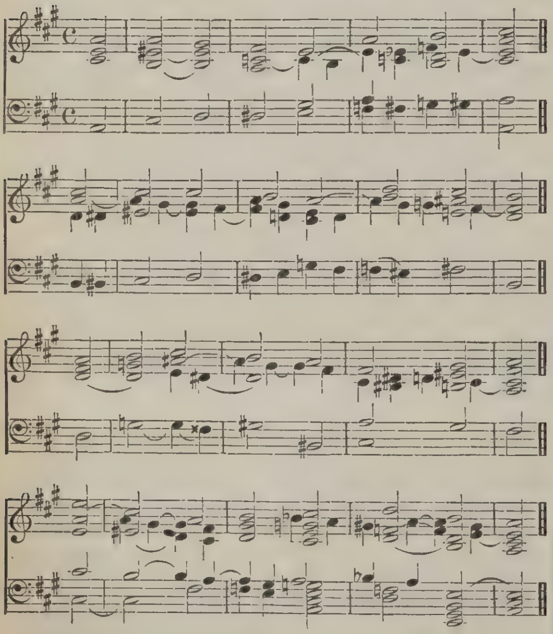
And the whole work seems one continued war."
Gifford's "Baviad."



Adams might have added: 'Tis but one step from the "Dandy sublime" to the "Dandy ridiculous."

Church music will be well represented at the Church Congress to be held in London next month. On Wednesday evening, October 11, in Westminster Abbey, the Bishop of Richmond will deliver an address on the Music of the Church, and the Abbey choir, under the direction of Sir Frederick Bridge, will contribute a series of illustrations consisting of anthems of the sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, and nineteenth centuries. On the same evening a meeting will be held in the Great Hall of the Church House, when the Dean of St. David's is announced to read a paper on Welsh Poetry and Music, illustrated by Welsh choirs and choral societies. The meeting at the Royal Albert Hall on Saturday evening, October 14, will be of exceptional interest to church musicians and church choirs. Papers will be read by the following distinguished musicians: Sir Hubert Parry, on the Essentials of Church Music; Sir George Martin, on the Training of Choristers; and Professor Villiers Stanford, on the Choice of Church Music. The Church Choir Association, and the Gregorian Association of upwards of 2,000 members, under the conductorship of Mr. Walter Alcock, deputy-organist of Westminster Abbey, together with representatives from every church choir in the Diocese of London, will attend, and the entire building will be reserved for the musical profession. Services will be held on the opening day of the Congress (October 10), in St. Paul's Cathedral, Westminster Abbey, and St. Mary Abbott's Church, Kensington. Previous to the ordinary Congressional sessions in the Albert Hall, organ recitals will be given by some of the leading organists, whose programmes will be inserted in the official guide, which will shortly be issued under the editorship of Prebendary Glendinning Nash, the honorary secretary of the Church Congress. We miss the name of Sir John Stainer from the church music section of the Congress.

Scotland has lost an earnest worker in the cause of church music by the death of the Rev. Dr. Alexander Balmain Bruce, Professor of Apologetics and New Testament Theology in the Free Church College at Glasgow. Professor Bruce, who was born at Aberdalgie, Strathearn, January 30, 1831, was one of Scotland's most scholarly and fearless theologians and an enthusiastic lover of music—two attributes that are rarely found in the same person. His services to the Free Church in the matter of church music can hardly be over-estimated. He not only took a leading part in the modern improvement in Scottish psalmody, but lost no opportunity of encouraging the musical tastes of his students. At his instigation special facilities were afforded to the future ministers of the Free Church for self-improvement in that respect. To Professor Bruce was mainly due the compilation of the Free Church Hymn Book, published in 1882; and he also rendered excellent service in the preparation of the recently issued Church Hymnary. The claims for a richer and more devotional service of song have had no sturdier champion than he who has been called away.

Musical Londoners and others who will not be otherwise occupied in shooting partridges during the present month will have their Orpheusian yearnings satisfied in two series of orchestral concerts. Mr. Robert Newman, at Queen's Hall, announced that he would open the ball with his Promenade concerts on the 26th ult. and that they would be continued until October 14. With Mr. Henry J. Wood as conductor, the artistic excellence of the concerts is a foregone conclusion. The concerts to be given at the Covent Garden Opera House, under the direction of Mr. Cecil Barth, begin on the 2nd inst. An orchestra of 150 performers will be conducted by Mr. George Riseley and M. Georges Jacobi. A special feature of the scheme is the announcement that several representative native composers have consented to conduct their own works. The list includes the names of Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Hubert Parry, Mr. Frederic H. Cowen, Mr. Edward Elgar, Mr. Edward German, Mr. Hamish MacCunn, Professor Ebenezer Prout, Professor Villiers Stanford, and Mr. Coleridge-Taylor.

"The Court" news apparently loses in accuracy in its journey across the border. The other day a newspaper hailing from North of the Tweed contained the following information:—

> "Madame Albany Mye and Mr. Kennerly Rumford, accompanied on the pianoforte by Mr. Swell, had the honour of singing before Her Majesty and the Royal Family in the evening."

Really! But the stickler for exactitude will exclaim: "Oh, Mye! it should be Gye." The same sapient one, be he kilted or otherwise, will discover the identity of the accompanist, "Mr. Swell," by adding the second vowel of the alphabet immediately after the initial sibilant of that one-letter-short patronymic. The name, as thus printed, might be technicalised as "an accompanist skilled in crescendoing," or, combining modern and ancient forms of expression, as "a great swell in the use of the swell."

The Munich Royal Academy of Music celebrated, on July 23, the twenty-fifth anniversary of its existence under that title. This excellent institution was, however, practically founded in 1867, in conformity, to a great extent, with a scheme submitted by Richard Wagner to King Louis II., of Bavaria, at the request of the latter, and was then known as "Königliche Musik-Schule"; Hans von Bülow being its first artistic director. Baron von Perfull, the present artistic chief, has occupied that position ever since the conversion of the institution into the Royal "Akademie der Tonkunst," in 1874, many of the leading teachers, including professors Rheinberger, Brückner, Sachs, Bussmeyer, and others, having likewise been associated with it from the commencement. The number of pupils at the Academy during the past academical year was 336, of whom sixty were of foreign nationality.

Dr. Edvard Grieg writes to The Times on the subject of pitch in the following terms:—

> Since my first visit to England it has always been my opinion that the high English pitch for pianos was unpractical. You will, then, understand that I am very glad to hear of the intention to take the decided step of a change. I feel convinced that an international uniformity has more and more been longed for by English musicians, and I congratulate all concerned on the approaching settlement of this important question.
> Edvard Grieg.
> Troldhaugen, Bergen, Norway, August 1.

It may be assumed that Dr. Grieg's opinion as to the unpracticability of the high pitch is not limited to pianofortes. Would that this "important question" were settled.

The violin—a superb Stradivarius—on which August Wilhelmj played for many years has recently been bought by a Chicago musician, Mr. Kupferschmied, for the sum of £2,000. This probably constitutes a "record" price in the violin market.

At a general meeting of the Allgemeine Richard Wagner Verein, held at Bayreuth on July 30, a resolution was passed to the effect that, the original objects of the Society having been in a great measure attained, its efforts should in future be directed chiefly to the increase of the established stipend fund for enabling musicians and others to witness the Festspiele, and to the further propagation of Wagnerian teachings by way of literary productions and otherwise. A falling off in the membership was recorded to the extent of 600 since the last general meeting two years ago; the total being now 2,523, spread over thirty-four branches. On the other hand, the stipend fund has been materially increased by the recent donation of 10,000 marks on the part of a well known Berlin capitalist.

The first Scarborough Musical Festival will be held on Wednesday and Thursday, October 18 and 19, in the Grand Hall of the Spa. The programme is as follows:—Wednesday evening: Mendelssohn's "St. Paul"; Thursday afternoon: Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and a miscellaneous selection; Thursday evening: Cowen's "Ode to the Passions," Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture, Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto in A minor (Miss Fanny Davies), &c. The solo vocalists engaged are Miss Helen Jaxon, Miss Florence Oliver, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Andrew Black. The band and chorus will number over 400, and the conductor will be Mr. Frederic H. Cowen.

The general committee of the National Eisteddfod, which meets in Liverpool next year, have agreed to the musical committee's recommendation to throw open the anthem and the organ sonata competitions to all competitors. The choral ballad, the contralto solo, and the tenor solo will be restricted to Welsh composers. "Judas Maccabæus" and the "Creation" have been selected for the Eisteddfod concerts, and it has been decided to accept from the Gitana Ladies' Choir the offer of a prize of five guineas for an arrangement for female voices of the Welsh melodies, "Ar hyd y nos" and "Hela'r Ysgnfarnog."

It is stated that of all the titles catalogued in the department of Printed Books at the British Museum during the past (official) year, no less than one-third are those of musical publications. American copyright has probably something to do with this remarkable state of affairs, as many of the entries are of music from the other side of the "big pond," marches being in the ascendency. There seems to be no lack of the productive element in music in America, as well as elsewhere; but, alas! "dry bones" predominate.

A crowded meeting of the newly formed Oxford and Cambridge Musical Club was held on July 24, Mr. Montague Barlow in the chair, when it appeared that the club already has some 300 members and shows every prospect of complete success. A committee was elected and the subscription was fixed. There is reason to expect that suitable premises will be secured in time for the club to be opened in the autumn. All communications should be addressed to Mr. H. M. Abel, 10, King's Bench Walk, Temple.

Don Lorenzo Perosi, having but recently completed the score of his new oratorio, "La Natività di Cristo," is already engaged upon another work, forming part of the proposed series illustrative of the life of the Saviour, and entitled "La Strage degli Innocenti" (The Massacre of the Innocents).

The idea of erecting the projected great monument to Johann Sebastian Bach inside the newly-restored Church of St. John, Leipzig, has now been definitely abandoned. Instead, the statue of the great Cantor is to be placed outside that historical edifice and on the site where, some years ago, were discovered the undoubtedly genuine remains of the master. This decision on the part of the committee will doubtless meet with very general approval.

Dr. Hugo Riemann, the distinguished Leipzig musical savant, and author, inter alia, of the well known "Musik Lexikon" (now being issued in its fifth, revised edition), celebrated, on July 18, his fiftieth birthday. Congratulations from many quarters have reached this indefatigable worker in the field of musical theory and history.

Mr. George Robertson Sinclair received the degree of Doctor of Music at the hands of the Archbishop of Canterbury, on July 24, at Lambeth Palace. Congratulations to the organist of Hereford Cathedral upon an honour richly deserved.

Mr. Alberto Randegger, conductor of the Norwich Festival, will form the subject of the biographical article in our October number.

A NEW FESTIVAL CONDUCTOR.

Mr. Ivor A. Atkins, Organist of Worcester Cathedral.

The organistships of the "Three Choirs" Cathedrals are held by three young men, all of whom were born in the seventh decade of the present century. The senior of the trio, both in regard to age and length of service, is Dr. Sinclair, of Hereford, who, musically speaking, is the father of the youngest—the organist of Worcester Cathedral, who forms the subject of these biographical notes.

Ivor Algernon Atkins was born at Cardiff, November 29, 1869. He is the fifth son of the late Frederick Pyke Atkins, who for thirty-five years was organist of St. John's Church, Cardiff. Mr. Atkins, Sen., was well known and greatly respected in South Wales. He was the first to conduct a performance of "The Messiah," in a complete form, in Wales. This was in 1859, the same year in which he, at the same time and place as Sir John Stainer, took the degree of Bachelor in Music.

It is quite natural that Ivor Atkins should have received his earliest musical training from his father. But almost his first lesson on the organ was given to him by Mr. C. Lee Williams, then organist of Llandaff Cathedral, and subsequently organist of Gloucester. It is not surprising to learn that Mr. Williams was then and has ever since been unfailingly kind to his youthful pupil. As a boy Mr. Atkins was for some time organist of two churches, Marstow and Pencoyd, of which the late Canon Holt Beever was the incumbent. During that time he studied classics, for which he had a natural aptitude, with a view to a career other than music.

In 1885, at the age of fifteen, he went to Truro, as assistant to Dr. G. R. Sinclair, who was six years his senior. From that time to the present they have been associated together in one way or another almost uninterruptedly. Those were the days of the old wooden pro-Cathedral at Truro with its John Byfield organ. Wretched though the decrepit instrument was, Sinclair made the most of it, and those who visited Truro could not fail to be impressed with both choir and organ. The organist and his assistant used to have some highly exciting times with that Byfield organ. It was always threatening a breakdown, which, however, was somehow or another averted. The drawstop of the big "Pedal Open" furnished some very amusing experiences. It was so stiff that the organist and his assistant broke endless stop handles until the local builder (somewhat of a genius in his way) hit upon the happy idea of a gimlet in the way of a draw-stop knob. Sinclair was so fascinated with the gimlet that he let it remain until the organ was rebuilt.

In 1890 Mr. Atkins followed his old—should it not be his young?—master, Dr. G. R. Sinclair, to Hereford, again as his assistant, and whilst at the city on the Wye he took his degree of Bachelor in Music at Oxford (1892) and also his diploma of the Fellowship of the Royal College of Organists (1893). "I owe," says Mr. Atkins, "a very great deal to 'G. R. S.,' who laid the foundation of my organ playing, and whose example all through as a player, as a conductor, and as an accompanist in church services was of the very best. Sinclair was a fine teacher, but I learnt most from hearing and watching him play. He was, and is, a modern."

In 1893 Mr. Atkins left Hereford upon becoming organist of Ludlow Parish Church, which post he held until June, 1897, when he was appointed organist of Worcester Cathedral. He says: "I am very fortunate here in being thrown into working relationship with the Rev. H. H. Woodward as Precentor, a man of fine musicianship, to whom the Cathedral owes much."

FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MESSRS. T. JONES, SON AND HARPER, LUDLOW.

The compositions of the Worcester organist include a five-part anthem, "Almighty God, give us grace," services, an organ sonata, and various songs. His University degree exercise was a setting of Psalm xxx., "I will magnify Thee, O Lord," for soli, chorus, and strings.

Mr. Atkins will make his first appearance as a Festival conductor at the Festival of the Three Choirs at Worcester, to be held during the present month. He has doubtless been equipping himself for the proper discharge of his arduous duties (we fancy that we saw him at a Richter rehearsal one day!). In helping to raise the standard of the "Three Choirs" performances he should assuredly come off with flying colours. May he achieve a great success, and may this his first Festival be but the precursor of many more that shall come under his enthusiastic sway.

HORATIO W. PARKER.

The Three Choirs Festival, soon to be holden at Worcester, will be invested with unusual interest. An American composer will make his first appearance at an English Musical Festival. We therefore have much pleasure in supplying a portrait of Professor Parker, the composer in question. No apology is needed for repeating the substance of his biography which appeared in a recent issue, especially as it forms a fitting accompaniment to his photograph.

Born of American parents, Horatio William Parker first saw the light at Auburndale, Massachusetts, on September 15, 1863. In all probability he will celebrate his thirty-sixth birthday at Worcester, as his "Hora Novissima" is to be performed on the preceding day. This coincidence will doubtless be noted by the Worcester people. His mother, a highly cultured lady of remarkable literary gifts, was his first music teacher. He was subsequently a pupil in harmony and counterpoint of Stephen A. Emery, of Boston, and of George W. Chadwick for composition. He held organ appointments at St. Paul's, Dedham, Mass., and St. John's, Boston Highlands. In 1882 Professor Parker went to Munich in order to gain the advantage of studying composition with Professor Rheinberger, and conducting under Ludwig Abel. At Munich (in 1885) his ballad "King Trojan" was performed. Returning to his native land, the gifted young composer held various organ appointments round about New York, and otherwise practised his profession. He now holds the most important organistship in the New England States, that of Trinity Church, Boston. He also occupies the Chair of Music at Yale College. He has composed several important works—including a symphony, a pianoforte concerto, overtures, &c. His most important choral work, "The Legend of St. Christopher," was produced in New York in April, 1898. At Worcester Professor Parker will conduct (and he is an excellent conductor) his "Hora Novissima" (an analysis of which appeared in The Musical Times for October, 1893), a work that is eminently suited to the religious environment of an English cathedral.

Much has recently been said in the public press on the entente cordiale between the two great English-speaking nations of the world. The theme is one that should never cease to vibrate in the hearts of all true sons and daughters of both countries. And should not its harmony be strengthened by the internationalities of statesmanship, commerce, journalism, and art? Therefore, as the oldest English musical journal, and as representing the musicians of the "old country," we extend a cordial welcome to an apostle of harmony from the other side of the Atlantic—the distinguished composer who is to honour us with a visit at Worcester in the person of Horatio William Parker.

J. L. HATTON IN AMERICA.

In the autumn of 1848 the genial and popular composer, John Liptrot Hatton, first set foot on American soil. He remained in the States for nearly two years, making friends everywhere and delighting large audiences with his fine pianoforte playing, his excellent singing, and his humorous songs. He crossed the Atlantic for the second time in the year of his return to England—1850, and again in 1866. It is, however, some incidents of his initial visit that we are about to record. The task is made easy and pleasant by the interesting letters written by Hatton to his family from America, which have been kindly placed at our disposal by his daughter, Miss Hatton. With the preliminary that Hatton was just going to be thirty-nine, when, on August 31, 1848, he arrived at New York, we will now proceed to sample his American letters. Writing from Astor House, New York, on September 10, 1848, he says:

> On Friday night last I gave a little concert in the Hotel to the members of the Press. They were somewhat taken by surprise—the novel character of the songs—they having never before heard anything in the style of "Robinson Crusoe," "The little fat man," "Little Red Riding Hood," &c. After having satisfied them, a few of the families residing in the hotel (for there are lots of private suites of rooms in this hotel, it being about as big as Golden Square) came in, and I had an audience of about fifty ladies and gentlemen. I sang them several songs, at which they laughed heartily; but when I came to "The Watkins's Evening Party," their mirth knew no bounds and they roared with laughter. Tell Fanny and Quita [Hatton's daughters] I did not snore at the end. The truth is: the Americans have never heard any but the most vulgar comic songs. There is a legend that some hardy individual once tried to sing John Parry's song of "Bluebeard," but it was a miserable failure. The style is entirely new to them, and from what I can see and hear, success is pretty certain.
> One of this morning's papers says: "A new musical celebrity. Among the latest arrivals is that of Mr. J. L. Hatton, a finished pianist. We had the pleasure of hearing Mr. Hatton at a private soirée at the Astor House. His playing and singing are in exquisite taste, full of expression, and altogether of a character well calculated to give him éclat and popularity. Mr. Hatton's style of singing operatic music is something like that of Braham. Mr. Hatton's manner is prepossessing (what do you think of that?) He enters thoroughly into the spirit of what he sings, and his humorous songs and medleys, composed by himself, and abounding in neat puns and 'palpable hits'—the double meaning of which he marks by a peculiar and happy accentuation—are really capital," &c., &c. Another says: "This gentleman comes amongst us with no small degree of fame, which is endorsed by such names as Grisi, Lablache, Cramer, and hundreds of other great musical stars" (rather good that!). Another has found out that: "This gentleman—whose name and reputation is familiar to all England, and who is the scion of a family that has been distinguished the last fifty years for its genius and musical talent—arrived in this city a few days ago. On Friday evening he gave a private soirée to a few citizens, to whom he had been introduced by letters from distinguished gentlemen of England. We were present, and we take great pleasure in saying we were delighted. The execution of Mr. Hatton, in our opinion, exceeds in delicacy, and what may be termed the poetry of music, that of any and of all his predecessors. He possesses none of the offensive egotism, none of the palpable charlatancy of ——. He is strictly original. There is no doubt Mr. Hatton will be triumphantly successful," &c., &c. This is coming it strong—a man of discrimination!!

Hatton speedily became a general favourite. He received an invitation from Mr. James Gordon Bennett, the "lion" of the New York editors, to stay with him at his country place at Hastings, on the Hudson, twenty miles from New York. He thus describes the river scenery:—

> It is a mixture of the Rhine and Danube. At one time you have beautiful undulating scenery—then mountainous scenery—then forests of trees coming down to the water's edge. . . . I never was more delighted in my life with any scenery. The Thames, as a river, is certainly nothing compared with it. This is my opinion of twenty miles' experience. What it will be when I sail as far as Albany I cannot tell; but if it is like this it must be magnificent indeed.

Mr. Bennett took Hatton for a picturesque drive of twenty miles. During its progress an incident took place which he thus describes:—

> On our way we called at the house of an old maid. I played a little to her, but it didn't do, as she was fond of "Divine music." She had a priest (being a catholic) who used to come and sing religious music. The next time I visit her I shall try the other tack and attempt the grave style, as she is rich and patronizes music. She laughed at the "little fat man" until her grey wig shook again—but she would rather have had the 100th Psalm.

Hatton's versatility is recorded in the same letter:—

> On Saturday last I sang at the Italian Opera. I was encored and, as the papers say, "made a decided hit."

He again refers to the Hudson scenery in glowing terms:—

> The Rhine, the Danube, the Firth of Forth, all put together might come up to the Hudson—but the luxuriant verdure which covers the mountains between Albany and Boston exceeds anything I ever saw. Mountains, large mountains, covered with fine large trees of every hue, from a bright red to the most delicate yellow, they looked like gigantic nosegays.

In regard to his first appearance in Boston, at the Musical Fund concert, December 9, 1848, he says:

> I must give you an account of my decided triumph last night. I am the more pleased, because it was a triumph of the right sort. I played Mendelssohn's beautiful concerto in G minor at a grand concert given by the Musical Fund. I was accompanied in first rate style by an orchestra of forty-five persons. On my entrance I was warmly greeted. During the concerto you might have heard a pin drop—although the room was crowded—at least 1,400 people. When I came to the last chord the applause came down fortissimo. I made an elegant bow and retired—the applause continued. I re-appeared amidst an universal cry of "encore." I then repeated the last movement of the concerto and once more retired amid deafening plaudits. That a classical piece of music should receive an encore took me completely by surprise. I can with safety now say, I am a decided favourite.

On December 23, 1848, Hatton gave what he called his "Grand Musical Festival," at the Melodeon, Boston, assisted by members of the Musical Fund Society and the Handel and Haydn Society, when he played "one of the greatest musical works on record—viz., Beethoven's celebrated Choral Fantasia." It was the first performance of the work in America. One of the conductors of the concert was Charles Edward Horn, the composer of "Cherry Ripe." Hatton composed two songs for the occasion and sang them. One was "a new pathetic ballad," set to words by Oliver Wendell Holmes, entitled "The Ballad of the Oysterman." The other, "a characteristic song," called "The Christmas Sleigh Ride," words by C. F. Hoffman. Hatton not only accompanied himself in this song on the pianoforte, but he attached to his legs a number of little bells, which he shook and thus supplied a realistic accompaniment. He also sang in "The Messiah"—"with good effect."

Hatton's humour constantly bubbles up in these letters. His Christmas gift for his wife was a brooch containing his portrait cut in a cameo. In regard to this he thus writes to her:—

> Your present, or New Year's gift, is a cameo—dug out of the ruins of Herculaneum. Do you not perceive a great likeness to Coriolanus? People say it's like me, but that can hardly be, as I never was there.

Niagara is referred to in a letter beginning—

> At last I have beheld this stupendous cataract. To say that I was delighted, surprised, is to say nothing. I was awestruck and never felt my own littleness in so marked a manner. I almost turned giddy whilst gazing at this tremendous convulsion of nature.

A specially interesting letter is that written from Hastings, U.S.A., on June 14, 1849. After describing a fishing excursion—"a worm at one end, and a fool at the other," as he calls it—which proved abortive, he refers to his loneliness and adds:

> But I have a pianoforte and can amuse myself with writing songs from old Herrick's poetry. I shall have a goodly stock of them when I return.

Is it not more than probable that Hatton wrote his best song, "To Anthea," on American soil? The inference is strengthened by his "Prefatory note" to the original edition, entitled "Songs and other poems by Herrick, Ben Jonson, and Sedley." Of the nineteen songs in this volume, seventeen are by Herrick. "To Anthea" is No. 4 of the set. Here is the "Prefatory Note," which has an added interest because it is practically unknown.

> The songs forming the contents of this volume were written at different times and under various circumstances. Some few of them were composed previous to my departure to America in the autumn of the year 1848, and presented as little souvenirs to several of my friends on my leaving England. The rest, with one exception, I wrote entirely for my own amusement during the time I was away, and all of them were composed without any view to their publication. This statement I think it necessary to make in order to account for the fragmentary and scrap-like form of some of them. On my return to England I was urged by one of my friends, who was cognisant of what I had done, to make a complete collection of these little compositions and publish them in a consolidated form.
> The kindness of my friends in restoring me some of my MSS. has enabled me to do this, and I now send these songs forth into the world satisfied if they should be the means in however humble a degree of adding to the material of musical enjoyment, or of contributing anything to the regeneration of the popular taste in an important department of chamber music.

> London, August, 1850. J. L. Hatton.

At Hastings it was "thundering hot" and there were hundreds of "lightening bugs" and other insects. From there he wrote:

> I used to go to bed, perfectly composed, surrounded by all these insects, but before I awoke they had all vanished. At half-past five I got up and practised the pianoforte with nothing on but my slippers and night-gown, dipped my head into cold water, took a good pinch of snuff, and "fired away."

At Boston (July, 1849) he played the organ in the principal church "to the gratification of a great number of people." He adds: "I found a very fine instrument and I pegged away in fine style." In a subsequent letter from Boston (August 28, 1849) he says:

> Since I have joined the choir in Trinity Church, the music has been much admired, and when I play the voluntary, some twenty or thirty of the congregation remain in the church to listen. This is all very gratifying and pleasant. I am smothered with invitations to visit country seats, &c.

Hatton also conducted the Handel and Haydn Society during the winter of 1849. He rehearsed, greatly to his dislike, Donizetti's opera "The Martyrs,"* but designated an oratorio in Boston. Apropos of this he writes:—

> I am a "Martyr" No. 1. It is supposed to be sacred. . . . There is a chorus of Christians, the words of which are decidedly melancholy and triste: yet they warm up, and at last get quite lively—jump about in semiquavers singing about Paradise.

During his first sojourn in America Hatton visited New York, Boston, Bangor, Cincinatti, Dedham, Detroit, Louisville, Portsmouth, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, Portland, Salem, and St. Louis, being everywhere received with great enthusiasm.

Our American readers will, we feel sure, learn with regret of the necessitous circumstances of J. L. Hatton's two daughters, aged fifty-seven and sixty respectively. Miss M. M. Hatton has been teaching for forty years, but owing to sad circumstances and having to help others she has not been able to provide for her future wants, and her health is now greatly impaired. The other daughter, Mrs. Frances J. Moore, is the widow of a doctor who died suddenly some years ago, leaving her and her five children totally unprovided for. Not only is her eyesight affected through an accident with lime, but owing to sudden and severe attacks of illness she is unfit to fight the battle of life, and both she and her sister find it more and more difficult to obtain employment.

Such are the circumstances of the case. What has been done to meet them? A subscription has been started, headed by the Right Hon. Arthur J. Balfour, M.P., who has given a donation of £200 from the Royal Bounty Fund. Other subscriptions obtained in England have brought up the total of the "Hatton-Moore Fund" to nearly £600. But to purchase annuities that shall keep the wolf from the door of Hatton's daughters during their lifetime a sum of £2,000 is needed! The following are in full sympathy with the movement: The Marquis of Lorne, K.T., Sir George Grove, Sir Arthur Sullivan, Mr. William H. Cummings (who is a Trustee), and others.

Will not some of the many American admirers of Hatton's music join in the effort to raise the needed sum of £1,400 whereby the daughters of the genial composer may be placed beyond the anxieties of want? Mr. T. Stanley Chappell, 50, New Bond Street, London, England, will gratefully receive and acknowledge any contributions which may be sent from either England or America towards this deserving object.

The annual report of the Musical Society of Victoria, Melbourne, has just reached us and gives evidence of the admirable work which is being accomplished by that association in the advancement of musical art. We read that: "The periodical examinations were held on October 29, 1898, and April 29, 1899, the number of candidates being 212, of whom 158 were successful." Also at the December meeting it was decided "that, as a recognition of special ability, and also as an incentive to more thorough study, the Society would present to the best candidate for diploma a gold medal, second-class diploma a silver medal, intermediate certificate a bronze medal, and elementary certificate a prize of books. To be eligible for these prizes candidates must secure a minimum of ninety marks in both the practical and theoretical sections of the examinations. This minimum has been reached only in the intermediate and elementary sections—by Miss Eileen Meagan (Convent of Mercy), Ballarat, and Miss Helen Clarke, of Caulfield, respectively." In order to encourage local composers, "the Council decided to give a prize of seven guineas for an original string quartet, and a prize of three guineas for an original unaccompanied part-song." The list of music performed at the monthly meetings indicates the generally high standard at which the Society aims.

* "The Martyrs" was performed for the first time in Boston on December 16, 1849, with the following cast: Miss Fanny Frazer, Paulina; Mr. F. Howard, Polyeucte; Mr. J. L. Hatton, Severus; Mr. Thomas Ball, Felix; and Mr. D. A. Granger, Calixtus. The work proved to be most successful; it was repeated to full houses six times before the end of January.

A PROMISING SOPRANO OF FIFTEEN.

"She is a great natural singer. I may be a false prophet, but, so far as I can foretell, Miss Evans will, with proper training, become one of the greatest singers the country has ever produced." Thus spake Mr. Ben Davies in awarding the soprano prize for the singing of "Hear ye, Israel," at the recent National Eisteddfod at Cardiff. In April last Dr. McNaught, in his adjudication at the Tonypandy Eisteddfod, also made special reference to the rare quality of this young girl's pure soprano voice.

Who is this victorious soprano of whom such great things may be expected? Amy Evans is her name, and she is a native of South Wales. She was born at Tonypandy, situated in Mid-Rhondda, on October 24, 1884, and therefore, "many happy returns" to her on her fifteenth birthday. Miss Amy Evans is the daughter of Mr. T. Vaughan Evans, an official of the Naval Colliery Company, Penygraig. Her mother has always been noted as a singer, as was also her grandmother, in connection with their respective places of worship. She has received her general education at the local Board school, and took some lessons in singing from Mr. Ivor Foster. Her music teacher for the last three years has been Mr. David Lloyd, organist and choirmaster of St. Andrew's Church, Tonypandy, who is a well known pianist in South Wales, and who commenced his public career by touring with the Royal Rhondda Glee Society in America. Since Amy Evans has been a pupil of Mr. Lloyd she has won no less than thirty first prizes at Eisteddfodau! It should be stated that Miss Amy Evans has rendered great service to her Sunday school and church by taking part in the concerts and services connected therewith.

FROM A PHOTOGRAPH BY MESSRS. GOLDIE BROS., QUEEN STREET, CARDIFF.

In the hope that all the expectations raised as to the artistic future of Miss Evans may be fulfilled, we have much pleasure in giving a portrait of her, together with the preceding biographical particulars, which have been kindly furnished by Mr. J. W. Jones, head-master of the Tonypandy Board school. Mr. Jones informs us that a fund has been started to provide means for the musical education of the gifted young lady, towards which the sum of £300 has already been contributed. It has not yet been decided whether she will be sent to London or to the Continent to further pursue her studies. The greatest care should be exercised in regard to this important—nay, vital—point. With her beautiful natural voice, it would indeed be lamentable if any of her voice trainers should be of the tribe of voice strainers. We shall watch her career with the greatest interest and sympathy, and wish her a hearty "God speed" as she pursues her journey along the art-road which leadeth unto success.

CHURCH MUSIC.

Reference has already been made to the issue of a book of tunes for the Roman Catholic Church. Incidentally, in this connection, it was pointed out that the mutations which the text of the ancient plain song melodies have undergone would engage the editor or editors in the difficult though interesting task of disentangling the original outlines from the additions of variations of centuries of traditional use. In some cases, indeed, the picturesqueness and beauty of the original canti fermi have been increased by what may be termed a melodic overgrowth, just as the ancient oak tree gains a new and acceptable gracefulness by the entwining clusters of ivy; and such of the old church tunes may be best left alone with all, or most of, their external graces.

In this connection one instance alone may be mentioned, the plain song setting of the "Tantum ergo" in the fourth mode, of which different versions are in use; these include one of modern date, in which the different dominant or governing notes are used, agreeing severally with the usually accepted form and the rarely used centre note of the scale involving a tritone question. Now, at least two versions of this melody, including the last-named, deserve to be retained.

A new spirit of simple eloquence and clearly defined earnestness came, however, upon the hymn tune about the middle of the sixteenth century. This was the adoption of less ornate melodic lines, based upon the general principle of a note, or count-beat, to each syllable of the words embodying the verbal text. This method culminated in the stately slow-moving German choral, with its majestic harmonic progression of chords or chord-positions changed at every count-beat.

Although Clement Marot's metrical version of the Psalms with Guillaume Le Franc's tunes as a musical foundation, and published in Paris in 1565, attained a very wide popularity in both Catholic and Reformed branches of the Church, the paraphrastic rhyming translation of the Psalms issued in England in the years 1549, 1553, 1569, 1636, &c., played no small part in establishing Psalmody upon what may be called its modern basis. The musicians who took part in this development included many men of high reputation, from Tallis to Henry Lawes. To the note against syllable method was added by degrees the rhythmical structures which are universally adopted now as the basis of all musical hymnology.

To pass on, there are many comparatively modern settings of the ancient Latin hymns from the time of Palestrina (who himself contributed a few fine hymn tunes to the universal store) to the interesting period when John Michael Haydn, the brother of the composer of the "Creation," wrote several tunes for the Benediction Service, during the time he was Chapelmaster at Salzburg, from 1762 to the end of his life. It must also be remembered that a little later than this period Samuel Webbe, then in charge of the music at the Sardinian Chapel in Lincoln's Inn, contributed sundry admirable tunes for the same and other hymns, which share with Michael Haydn's tunes a world-wide recognition.

Once more, many good settings of both Latin and English hymns have been written by composers of our own day, which may well claim recognition at the hands of the authorities engaged in carrying out the very interesting work which is the object of these comments. Such an undertaking cannot fail to command the attention of all concerned in the preservation and advancement of Christian musical art.

There can be no more gratifying feature of colonial progress than the evidences afforded from time to time of the earnestness with which religious institutions are being supported. All Saints' Church, Petersham, near Sydney, New South Wales, is a notable illustration in point. At the dedication of the new choir stalls, sedilla, &c., by the Archbishop of Sydney, on St. Peter's Day, the musical services were, after the manner at this church, excellently rendered under the direction of Mr. W. T. Wood as choirmaster, and with Mr. W. Angus at the organ keyboard. The Service was Wesley in G, and the anthem was Adlam's setting of part of the 118th Psalm, beginning with the words "Open to me the gates."

At the monthly musical service at Portsmouth Parish Church, on the 6th ult, selections were given from Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." Mr. R. H. Turner played several organ solos.

The Norwich Diocesan Church Choral Association has taken advantage of the long summer days to hold several district festivals during the last few weeks, when really good results have been shown by the various country choirs engaged. Dr. Bates has conducted with conspicuous tact at such festivals at Pulham St. Mary, Cromer, and other parishes in the diocese.

ORGAN MUSIC.

Whatever may be wanted in Ireland, originality and a sense of humour, none the less pungent because apparently unconscious, rarely seem to be absent from the consideration of any subject commanding the attention of public bodies. The town council of the historical city of Londonderry has been thoughtful enough to secure the services of five organists to play the fine four-manual organ in the Guildhall, to undertake the care of the instrument, and to give free recitals. These gentlemen are to play monthly in a given rotation—presumably two months each in the course of a year; and are each to receive a fee or nominal salary of two guineas per annum. They are further "to be under the full control of the Mayor and committee." Here are notable suggestions for corporations and other public bodies having organs and musical performances under their charge. It will be a matter of interest to see how far the Londonderry authorities control the selection of music and how much of it will be patriotic, political, and topical, in order to suit the somewhat varied, not to say fiery, tastes of the withal warm-hearted inhabitants of the famous historical city.

It is often remarked in America, that our great organists are too little known in the States. Perhaps this is in part a result of inadequate recognition in the old country. The news that Mr. Clarence Eddy, one of the leading recitalists of the present day, has been appointed official or representative organist for the United States at the approaching Paris Exposition, would seem to show that the recognition of art in the dignified treatment of the artist is not as well practised here as elsewhere. One cannot but regret that our great organists do not travel more, and so claim the larger appreciation due to them as artistic leaders.

Mr. Maughan Barnett continues his recitals at St. John's, Wellington, New Zealand. On July 6 his programme was one of the many tributes to the popularity of the modern French school, including, as it did, two pieces by Léfébure-Wély and movements by Widor and Dubois.

Mr. Roscher Ascham's organ recitals also continue their course at Feather Market Hall, Port Elizabeth, the programme of the sixty-first, given on July 30, including a Sonata by Wolstenholme, the Toccata from Widor's Fifth Symphony, and Pastorale, No. 2, in C major, by E. H. Lemare.

It is encouraging to note a Bach recital in the Cathedral Church at Graham's Town, the organplayers being Miss G. Watts and Mr. W. Deane. The music included several of the better known organ works by the great Leipzig Cantor. If not the first "Bach" recital given in a colonial centre, this recital is at least one of the early instances of such homage to the father of modern organ players.

At the Alexandra Palace a programme recently played by Mr. Sidney A. Mosdell included "a goodly assortment" of English organ music, consisting of Sir Frederick Bridge's Sonata in D minor, Smart's too much neglected Fantasia in G, and Dr. Vincent's "Sunset Melody." Mendelssohn's posthumous Air with variations in D and Guilmant's Sonata in D minor (Op. 42) were also played. Mr. R. E. Parker's list of pieces, lately played at a recital in Wilmslow Parish Church, included Pastorale in E (E. H. Lemare), Allegretto in B minor (Guilmant), and Grand Chœur (Lemmens).

At Romsey Abbey, Mr. W. Carey Bliss recently gave a recital including two Monologues (Rheinberger), Cantilène Pastorale (Guilmant), and Prelude in C sharp minor (Rachmaninoff). Mr. F. J. Livesay gave a recital at the Priory Church, St. Bees, on the 4th ult., when his programme included Rheinberger's Sonata in E minor (No. 8) and Best's highly effective Toccata in A major. At Canterbury Cathedral, on the 9th ult., the organist, Mr. H. C. Perrin, gave a recital, including Allegretto in B minor (E. H. Lemare), Andante in E minor (Smart), and an arrangement of the Finale of Schumann's "Etudes Symphoniques."

At St. Michael's Church, Abergele, Mr. Ernest H. Smith, organist of St. Bede's Church, Liverpool, gave a recital on the 13th ult. His programme included Mozart's Adagio in D; Costa's March ("Naaman"); pieces by Dvorák, Chopin, and Gounod, and a Cantilène in B flat and Fantasia "Rock of Ages" by the performer.

Some touches of unconscious humour occur in a press notice of a recital lately given by Mr. Granger at Kendal, not unknown as a provincial centre of earnest musical life. An Andantino by Mr. Lemare is described as "a characteristic example of the later French school." We are further informed that Guilmant's First Sonata "is a fine but scarcely characteristic composition." The performance of Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in G major is described as "having a pronounced leaning to the composer's swaying style rather than to any new innovation on the part of so-called improvers." A well-merited compliment is paid to the performer in the words concerning another piece, that it was played "without any undue declamation of style." The critic has at least the desire to be just, even though his method of expression is wanting in decision and perspicuity.

During August the organ at St. Peter's Church, Vere Street, has been thoroughly cleaned, and an entirely new draw-stop action put in; also a new double diapason on the great, the pipes forming a front on the North side of the chancel. A pedal octave-coupler has also been added. The work has been carried out by Messrs. Hill and Son.

Mr. W. W. Starmer, organist of St. Mark's, Tunbridge Wells, gave recitals at Hever Parish Church, on July 29, and at St. Mark's, Broadwater Down, on the 26th ult. On the first occasion he was assisted by Mr. Henry Tolhurst (violin). The programme of the second recital included Bach's Choral Vorspiel, "Christ, unser Herr"; Schumann's Fugue on the name of Bach; Minuet and Trio (Op. 43), Sterndale Bennett, and a new Fantasia in D minor by the performer.

Mr. Herbert Walton is again giving a series of recitals in the Cathedral, Glasgow. Bach's Toccata and Fugue in C major and pieces by Dudley Buck and G. Pierne were included in the opening recital, on the 14th ult.

Mr. C. H. Moody, organist of Holy Trinity Church, Coventry, gave a recital, on the 17th ult., at St. Cybi's Collegiate Church, Holyhead, when the programme included Lemaigre's Elegy and Bach's Prelude and Fugue in C minor.

THE WAGNER FESTIVAL AT BAYREUTH.

(From our Special Correspondent.)

The programme of the Wagner Festival, which commenced on July 22 and extended over a month, consisted of two performances of the "Ring des Nibelungen," together with seven of "Parsifal" and five of "Die Meistersinger," the festival ending on the 20th ult. with "Parsifal." The productions were, as usual, full of interest, and gave evidence of most careful preparation; but, if the first week's experiences may be taken as a fair sample of the whole, it may be seriously doubted, not only whether any advance has been made, but even whether the standard of eight or ten years back has been fully maintained. I am inclined to attribute a certain want of vitality in this year's performances to two causes. For reasons with which it is impossible not to feel a measure of sympathy, Siegfried Wagner has been put forward as conductor. He first directed the "Ring" performances in 1896, so that he is not entirely a novice, and it must be admitted that he has given sufficient proof of musical capacity since then, both as a conductor and as a composer. While allowing this, however, it cannot be said that he has a sufficient measure of experience to successfully grapple with so exacting a task as the "Ring" affords. Certainly there were indications of a want of command, a lack of precision, that were perhaps individually slight, but collectively detracted from the impressiveness of the work. The difference when Richter assumed the command, at the first "Meistersinger" performance, was very marked. This revival of the "Meistersinger" was indeed the high-water-mark of the festival, and fully sustained the traditions of Bayreuth; the perfection of the ensemble, and the wonderful clearness with which even the most complicated choruses were given being quite remarkable.

The second shortcoming was the tendency to drag the time, which has become one of the "traditions" of the place. It originated, no doubt, with Wagner's own desire that the melody should be emphasized as much as possible; for, strange as it may appear to those who cling to the notion that he abhorred melody, he expressly insisted upon it as the soul of music. It is one thing, however, to dwell upon a melodic phrase in order to give it full expressiveness, and quite another to drag it out until its rhythm is in danger of dislocation. The first Act of the "Götterdämmerung" was a notable instance of this, and there were times when the long-drawn phrases created a feeling of positive discomfort, not only on one's own account, but on account of the singers and wind instrument players clinging to a note with the last remnant of their breath. To no other reason than this could I attribute the fact that "Parsifal," for the first time in my experience of five festivals, seemed in many parts almost dull. That this had nothing to do with any want of ability in the conductor is certain, for that post was filled by Franz Fischer, of Munich. That it was not attributable to any personal idiosyncrasy of the listener is shown by the fact that my feeling was shared by not a few others, equally enthusiastic admirers of the work, and habitués at Bayreuth.

It would be unkind to insist upon these shortcomings; but Bayreuth, whether consciously or not, has afforded a pattern to the rest of the operatic world, and obtained a prestige so great that it is no doubt difficult of maintenance. It is the harder to keep its supremacy since its example has been so largely followed in other theatres. At Munich, for instance, where a sort of "side show" to Bayreuth is being held, I saw the other day a production of "Tannhäuser" in which the Bayreuth staging was followed in almost every detail, while the beautiful scenery had been prepared by the very artist who was engaged for the Bayreuth production of that work. Intelligent and artistic supervision had been brought to bear upon this performance at Munich, where, during this special season, every one of Wagner's works—including even "Die Feen," which is Munich's monopoly—is being given, save the three which are included in the Bayreuth selection. With such powerful rivalry, the Wagnerian stronghold would find it difficult to hold its own, were it not for the perfect conditions for hearing and seeing, and for the exclusion of all that is irrelevant, that still distinguishes the Bayreuth theatre from all others.

It has also, of course, another important advantage in its exclusive right to "Parsifal." One would, for obvious reasons, not care to see "Parsifal" taken up at ordinary opera houses; but it may be said that even here a little wholesome rivalry would do no harm. Still, in spite of the shortcomings to which I have referred, there were points which remained unassailable. The scene in the Temple is still unique in its solemn impressiveness and beauty, and I think it would not be going too far to assert that there is nothing in the whole range of musical drama that can be compared with it. The opening "Parsifal" performance afforded a new Kundry in Frau Ternina, the Munich artist, who sang the music with perhaps greater vocal charm than any of her predecessors, while histrionically she was admirable. She is perhaps the most consummate artist of all the present generation of German dramatic sopranos. The most notable successes in the "Ring" were obtained by Van Rooy, whose Wotan is now recognised as the noblest and most dignified on the stage, and by Burgmüller, whose Siegmund showed the advance he has made since he first appeared (as Siegfried) in 1896. Gulbranson's Brünnhilde is no new thing, but I cannot forbear a passing allusion to her impressive performance. As an impersonation I incline to place the Beckmesser of Friedrichs, in the "Meistersinger" production, in the very first place. This admirable artist took the part in 1889, and soon afterwards was the victim of a nervous ailment from which he has only recently recovered. His impersonation shows, however, no deterioration, but rather greater ripeness, without any of the exaggeration or burlesque to which the part lends itself, and which familiarity is apt to engender. I must not forget to mention also the David of an apparently young artist, Schramm, who was not only physically well suited to the part, but had just that lightness of touch which it demands. The part of Pogner was taken by Sistermanns, an artist hitherto associated only with the concert-room. His colleagues, the products of Bayreuth training, Burgmüller, Van Rooy, Breuer — still an admirable Mime, though now slightly inclined to exaggerate—and Gulbranson, were remarkably successful. At later performances Burgmüller took the part of Parsifal; Van Rooy that of Hans Sachs. To my sorrow I did not witness either impersonation, but, according to the judgment of many German critics who were present, both were of remarkable excellence. There can be little doubt that Bayreuth is doing almost as great a work in training artists as it has done in affording a model theatre and model performances. As one keenly anxious that its reputation should not suffer diminution, I have ventured to call attention to what seem to me to be shortcomings. In spite of them, however, Bayreuth remains a unique monument to the genius of its creator—a manifestation of national art of which Germany has every reason to be proud.

THE INCORPORATED STAFF-SIGHT-SINGING COLLEGE.

The annual general meeting of the Incorporated Staff-Sight-Singing College was held at the Guildhall School of Music, on July 22, when there was a good attendance of members, including the president, Mr. William H. Cummings, in the chair.

The honorary secretary, Dr. Hamilton Robinson, read a very interesting report, which was unanimously adopted, and from which it appears that 233 candidates entered for the various Metropolitan and Provincial examinations held during the past year, of whom 178 passed, 90 obtaining honours. Satisfactory events of the year included the issue of Part I. of the "Manual of Sight-Singing," prepared by Dr. F. J. Sawyer at the special request of the council, and the construction and publication of the complete modulator of the College.

A short financial statement was made by the honorary treasurer, Dr. Warwick Jordan, and the balance sheet was adopted. Dr. W. G. McNaught was unanimously elected a member of the council, and the honorary treasurer and honorary secretary were re-elected.

Following the business of the meeting an informal and most interesting discussion of matters connected with the aims of the College took place, upon the initiative of Mr. W. H. Cummings, to whom a vote of thanks terminated the proceedings.

THE WELSH NATIONAL EISTEDDFOD.

(From our own Correspondent.)

As promised in our last issue, we now resume the record of the National Eisteddfod at Cardiff.

This year the second choral competition proved to be the best contested of all the choral series. The test pieces were "Therefore with joy," from Bennett's "Woman of Samaria," and a somewhat lengthy Welsh composition, "Peace" (T. Price); the first prize being well won by a choir from Talke, Staffordshire, the Cardiff Blue Ribbon Choir taking second honours. The Barry Male-Voice Choir was placed first for singing Dr. Hiles's "Hushed in death" and Dr. Joseph Parry's "Jesus of Nazareth," Mountain Ash being second. In the female choral contest the selections were Mendelssohn's "Oh, praise the Lord," and a Welsh air, "Y gwenith gwyn," arranged by Mr. Emlyn Evans; Swansea being awarded the first and Nantlle, Carnarvonshire, the second prize. Twelve juvenile choirs essayed Barnby's "Sweet and low" and "On we go" (R. Price), Llwynpia, Rhondda Valley, and Treboeth, Swansea, being declared first and second respectively.

In the chief choral competition, reported in our last, none of the choirs seemed to grasp the proper sentiment—the delicacy as well as fervour—of Sir Hubert Parry's "Blest Pair of Sirens," and one of the ablest put itself out of court through having dropped nearly a tone and a half in the pitch of Mendelssohn's Psalm "Why rage fiercely the heathen." This matter of faulty intonation should receive the serious attention of Welsh conductors, it being one of their besetting sins. Sir Frederick Bridge, whilst giving due praise when merited, though never carried away into over-laudation, plainly informed the Welsh choirs that their singing, though highly creditable upon the whole, was neither perfect nor superior to what other parts of the country could produce. They should lay this lesson to heart, and the marked success of the Staffordshire choir in the second competition—following as it did earlier successes at important local Eisteddfodau—should drive that lesson home. Purity of tone, natural and unexaggerated interpretations are the points they must aim at, if they are to hold their own.

Dr. Hiles's glee was beyond the capacities of Welsh male-voice choirs in general, thanks to their almost utter neglect of the proper head-voice register and the forcing upwards of so-called chest notes. The juvenile contest was up to the usual average, but the singing of the female choirs was not equal to what has been heard at previous national and some local Eisteddfodau. The glee competition was interesting, inasmuch as it included a test in sight-singing, in addition to the rendering of Callcott's "O snatch me swift." The sight-reading test provided was "Wake music then," by James Coward, and it is to be hoped that the comparative success of this year's venture in this direction may lead to this too much neglected branch receiving greater attention in future.

It is to be regretted that the chanting competition fell through—no choir having entered; but as it was pointed out when the list of subjects was first issued, the conditions were much too onerous, especially when the generally backward state of chanting in Wales is considered. Choirs were at liberty to select their own chant, but the Psalms were to be "selected by the adjudicators from the Cathedral Paragraph Psalter"—much too wide a field. Had a limited number of Psalms been specified, to be sung in English from the above Psalter, or in Welsh from the "Psallwyr Cadeiriol" recently issued by Messrs. Novello, out of which the judges could make a selection, a different result might have been secured and a service rendered to the cause of chanting in Welsh churches and chapels.

The vocal solo competitions call for no particular comment. In the majority of cases the prizes were won by well-known Eisteddfodic competitors; and if in one or two instances new and promising voices were discovered, it is to be hoped they may be allowed to develop into artists by proper training. One of the ever-present dangers of the Eisteddfod, especially if the winners are young, is the indiscreet adulation of friends, and the magnifying of an initial success to undue proportions; thus producing many ultimate failures, a certain number of mediocrities, and but rarely a satisfactory and finished vocalist.

This year again a feeling of disappointment has to be expressed in connection with the orchestral results; not so much as to the quality, but the number of contestants. Parts of Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, as well as the prima vista test were very well rendered by the Cardiff contingent, the other band from Newport being a deserving second. The Cardiff Young Men's Christian Association orchestra also gave a very creditable performance of portions of Beethoven's Symphony, No. 7, limited to amateurs, but where was the rest of Wales? The quintet for wind instruments (C. Lefèbre), and string quartet (Mendelssohn's No. 2) again only induced one entry each, and they hailed from the neighbourhood. The instrumental solo competitions were more satisfactory, many of them being keen, and the successful candidates representing various parts of the Principality. In the military band contest—the test piece being Mendelssohn's Overture in C—the first prize fell to Mogg's Military band, Weston-super-Mare; the second to the 2nd Glamorganshire Volunteer Artillery, and the third to the Cardiff Military band. Nantlle Vale, Carnarvonshire, was placed first for playing selections from Verdi by brass bands; Llan, Festiniog, second; the third prize being divided between Aberdare and Arael Griffin (South Wales).

A number of prizes were offered in musical composition; some were withheld for want of sufficient merit, but the chief prize—for a cantata—was awarded, the winner being Mr. Edward Broome, organist, Montreal, but a native of Bangor, North Wales, who also won the leading prize at Festiniog last year.

The concerts, which were well patronised, offered no particular novelty, the chief choral works being Sullivan's "Golden Legend" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah." The contralto soloists were Miss Clara Butt and Miss Hannah Jones. The part of the Prophet in "Elijah" was excellently interpreted by Mr. David Hughes; Mr. Ben Davies, also in fine voice, representing Prince Henry in the "Golden Legend." The other vocalists engaged at the Eisteddfod were Mesdames Drinkwater, Lucy Clarke, Eleanor and Miriam Jones, Messrs. Trevor Evans, R. Thomas, John Sandbrook, Ivor Foster, and H. Miller. Mr. T. E. Aylward ably conducted an effective choir of 500 voices, and an orchestra of 100 players (led by Mr. E. T. Roberts), well balanced and of good tone, rendered efficient service.

The adjudicators, in addition to Sir Frederick Bridge, were Messrs. Aylward, Emlyn Evans, Ben Davies, Joseph Parry, Daniel Price, R. Rogers, Eos Dâr (Pennillion singing), and Walter Reynolds (brass and military bands).

It only remains to add that the Eisteddfodic arrangements were well made and satisfactorily carried out, and to bear testimony to the unvarying and ready courtesy of the officials generally.

EISTEDDFODAU IN WALES.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The annual Eisteddfod was held at Treorky, Glamorganshire, on Bank holiday, the 7th ult. The winners in the chief choral competition ("Worthy is the Lamb") were the Pontycymmer Harmonic Society; in the first male voice ("Last days of Pompeii"), Porth and Cymmer, and the second ("Comrades in Arms"), Treorky Young Musicians. There were other minor choral competitions, and the usual solo items, also brass, and drum and fife band contests. The adjudicators were Dr. Roland Rogers, Mr. Harry Evans, and Mr. R. Stead (bands).

On the same day the Corwen (North Wales) Eisteddfod, which has grown to be an important annual fixture, was held. The first choral prize, for singing Handel's "Hallelujah" Chorus and a part-song by Mr. J. H. Roberts, was awarded to the Brynbowydd (Festiniog) Choir; Mr. T. Price, Merthyr, being the adjudicator. As will be noted, all the above competitive pieces, with the exception of the part-song, have been sung times without number at Eisteddfodau, and as tests or incentives to musical advancement are utterly valueless. It is a mere matter of gate money; art is ruthlessly sacrificed, but what matters it if a committee can in one day place £400 to its credit at its bankers?

REVIEWS.

Harvest Song. For Soprano Solo and Chorus. Words written by Joseph Bennett. The music composed by C. Lee Williams. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

This work forms part of the programme for the fast approaching Worcester Festival, for which it has recently been revised and altered by the composer. The text may be described as a paraphrase of well-known harvest Psalms and is admirably designed to meet musical requirements. The music is in Mr. Lee Williams's most genial style, and, while unpretentious and of little executive difficulty, it is tasteful, bright, pleasing, and often impressive. The work commences with a flowingly written instrumental "Pastorale," at the conclusion of which the tenors and basses enter in unison with the words: "Say what God hath done for us, while the seasons changed and pass'd." This is taken up by the sopranos and altos in four-part harmony, and answered by the soprano soloist in grateful phrases. The first important chorus which follows is graceful and melodious and is worked up to an effective climax. The first part concludes with the choral "Now thank we all our God"; it is suggested, however, that any harvest hymn could be substituted. The second portion is of like character to the first, and the final chorus is concluded with a chorale composed expressly for the Royal Gloucestershire Lodge of Freemasons in 1890. Apart from the increased interest attached to the work by its acceptance by the Worcester Festival Music Committee, the music will be found admirably suited for ordinary church use.

Nine Special Studies. For the Pianoforte. By Arthur Somervell. [Ashdown and Co.]

No. 1. Rapid, broken scale passages for the right hand, with the thumb usually held down. This holding of the thumb is carried out somewhat fitfully through the piece; but probably the composer wished to have compassion on an untrained hand. A useful study for attaining independence of fingers, especially so for the fourth and fifth. No indication whatever is given for the left hand, whether it is to be legato, staccato, or slurred. Not one finger given from beginning to end. There is no harm in this, if carried consistently through the whole work, and if intended only for a student with teacher. But, as Mr. Somervell says in his Preface, the studies are intended for "pupils in the early stages of learning," at which period they cannot too soon begin to acquire some idea of phrasing and good fingering.

No. 2. A somewhat similar study for the left hand, only not nearly so difficult in proportion, thus acknowledging, as it were, the lesser skill and strength of the average left hand.

Nos. 3 and 4. Two useful little preliminary studies in double thirds, the one for the right hand, the other for the left. Here fingering and phrasing have both been inserted, to the great gain of the studies.

No. 5. This is perhaps the best study in the book; arpeggio passages with a change of finger on one note, and played at a rapid pace. It is a particularly useful exercise, and a similar one for the left hand, to follow, would have been very desirable. Even Cramer, the old "Classic," was sadly wanting in this respect, his left hand studies running in about the proportion of one to twenty. Czerny, on the other hand, seldom gave a right hand study without its complement to follow.

No. 6. Another example of broken chords; very bright and pretty, but not containing much work as a study. The left hand has absolutely nothing to do, except to accompany in octaves.

No. 7. Equal work for both hands—a sustained note, with a chord accompaniment. This will be found very useful for young players, but phrasing indications would have given it a still greater value, as the youthful students for whom these are intended would scarcely discover for themselves the two-bar and four-bar phrases.

No. 8 is an easy octave study for the right hand only, and No. 9 another arpeggio study, also for the right hand.

It will be seen that the labour, in these nine studies, is very unequally divided between the two hands. Perhaps Mr. Somervell will follow up this series by another for the left hand; for, in regard to that one point, Cramer is not to be held up as an example, though in every other point he may be. Perhaps also in a second edition the composer will amplify the very sparse indications of phrasing, fingering, and dynamic signs, which would considerably increase the value of these useful little studies.

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 799-809. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

Every description of part-song is included in this excellent series. No. 799, entitled "The Union Jack," sounds the note of patriotism with "brazen tongue." British folk may be credited with visual familiarity with our fighting flag, but it is doubtful if the majority could describe in particular the three flags, those of St. George of England, St. Andrew of Scotland, and St. Patrick of Ireland, which, united, form the "Union Jack." Those, however, who sing or listen to this part-song will become of the learned minority. The esteem in which these several flags are held by the respective nations to which they belong, together with the glory pertaining to the triple union, has provided Mr. Shapcott Wensley with the material for his stirring lines, which have been allied to music of martial and rhythmic character by Mr. Alfred R. Gaul. The work is divided into four parts, the first three preceded by a short instrumental phrase from a tune associated with the particular country referred to in the subsequent part-music, and the complete flag being introduced by a few bars of "Rule, Britannia." In its arrangement as an action-song for children the work has already achieved popularity.

"The Countryman" (No. 800), words anonymous, the music by Charles Wood, sets forth the joys and advantages of a country life in a manner commonly expressed by those who live in towns. The music is in four neatly written vocal parts and is as direct in expression as the words they illustrate.

"Love is enough" (No. 801), by William Morris and Gustav von Holst, calls for a well-trained body of capable singers to do it justice. But such will be interested in the music, and those who have some knowledge of composition will scarcely fail to admire the ingenuity shown by the composer in setting the text and echoing its spirit.

The music of Nos. 802 to 809, inclusive, is by Josef Rheinberger, the series forming Opus 186 of this prolific composer. The first is entitled "All Souls' Day," the words translated from the German of August Ganther by the Rev. Dr. Troutbeck, who has also provided the English text of the other seven part-songs. The music, as befits the subject, is solemn and moving, richly and solidly harmonised, and could easily be made impressive in performance. "Sunday Morning" (No. 803) is somewhat similar in style, but is brighter in spirit. Some of the harmonic effects are fascinating. "St. Mary's Chapel" (No. 804) tells in direct tones the peace that goes out to the weary and distressed from a certain chapel in which the Virgin manifests her presence. "Messengers of Spring" (No. 805), strikes a brighter note. The gladness which this season invariably brings is expressed in the music, which, crisply sung, could not fail to tell its tale in exhilarating fashion to its listeners. "Rhapsody" (No. 806) is an expressive Adagio in A flat. It demands a good choir, although it will not be found difficult to read. Well sung it would be very charming. "Rhineland" (No. 807) described as a "Rheinisches Tanzlied," is as gay and vigorous as such a song should be. Rendered with spirit it would be difficult to keep the feet still, and those who may listen to this part-song will be assuredly persuaded that the poet had good reason for the declaration, "My heart's on the Rhine." "The Peace of God" (No. 808) may be described as a meditation on the familiar and unfathomable "blessing," and the solemn lines have inspired the composer to write music of a flowing and expressive character. "The Last Prayer" (No. 809) is a solemn petition to the Creator in the hour of death. There is a firmness and confidence in the music that admirably reflect the spirit of the text and the part-song possesses decided distinctiveness and could be made most impressive.

A Noon-day Melody. Song. Words by John MacDonald. Music by William Nicholl.

Dorothy Doone. Words by E. Nesbit. Music by Stanley Hawley.

To Sunalini. Words by Sarojini Chattopâdhyây. Music by Cuthbert Kelly.

[Leonard and Co.]

THE words of "A Noon-day Melody" might be taken as an argument in favour of suicide, but they have a poetical ring, and the vocal part is most gratefully laid out for the voice—two good recommendations.

"Dorothy Doone" is a damsel who seems to have stolen two hearts, and as she has only one to give in return, the swain who receives no compensation is in a sorry plight. It behoves a tenor vocalist to adequately set forth this tragedy, which is allied to melodious and singable music.

"To Semalini" is a very pleasing and tasteful "song of sleep," and the maiden to whom it is sung should have happy dreams. It is published in two keys, respectively suitable for a baritone or tenor voice.

My Study Window. Words by Henry Kirke White. Music by Arthur Fox.

Take, O take those lips away. Words by Shakespeare. Music by Arthur Fox.

[Charles Woolhouse.]

BOTH these songs merit the attention of amateur vocalists. The music echoes the words in a pleasant manner, and the accompaniments are simply and fluently written. The first ditty demands a tenor voice, but the second could be efficiently sung by a baritone.

Air de Ballet with Intermezzo. For Pianoforte. Op. 11. By Theophil Wendt. [Novello and Company, Limited.]

THERE is plenty of character, spirit, and "go" about this piece, at least about the first part. When Mr. Wendt sets himself to write a simple melody and to stick to it, he is charming. The Intermezzo, in this respect, is not equal to the first subject; but, on the other hand, it is a rare thing to find two subjects of equal interest—it denotes a very masterly hand when such is the case, and the average composer makes one pinch of salt serve for the two. There are sufficient indications in the piece before us that the composer has plenty of material at hand—age and experience will sort it out. Meanwhile he has given us, in his Air de Ballet, a piquant, melodious, and tasteful piece of average difficulty, which should meet with much popularity.

The music composed by S. Coleridge-Taylor (Op. 37, Nos. 1—6.)

IT is always pleasurable to review Mr. Coleridge-Taylor's music, for it invariably possesses a freshness, boldness, and protest against conventionalism, and frequently a beauty of expression, as fascinating as it is exhilarating. All these estimable and attractive qualities are found in this series of six songs, which form Opus 37 of the young and singularly gifted composer. Before describing the songs in detail, mention should be made of the discrimination that has been shown in the choice of the words. This is a matter of the greatest importance to composers, and it is most satisfactory to find that Mr. Taylor possesses this faculty of appreciation in such estimable degree, for too often want of this critical perception has led to regrettable failure.

"You'll love me yet!" is one of the most lucid, and it may be added most charming, of Robert Browning's poems; its alternate diffidence, hope, and confidence are echoed with delightful truthfulness in Mr. Taylor's music. This song has already been noticed in our July number; it may, however, be added that the song is now published in two keys and would be equally suitable to a tenor or baritone voice.

The "Canoe Song" is decidedly original in conception and treatment. The 6-8 measure commonly associated with such lyrics is forsaken for duple time and a reiterated figure in the accompaniment of simple but most suggestive character. The words pleasingly clothe a poetic fancy and the pianoforte part seems to have been inspired by the glint of the moon and the stars on the dancing water. This song is also published in two keys, in D flat and F, the vocal compass of the former extending from B flat below the treble stave to the E flat an octave and a fourth above.

Contralto vocalists who possess dramatic perception should make early acquaintance with "A blood-red ring." The text tells a tragic story with forcible directness and terseness, and Mr. Taylor, who is never more happy than when treating barbaric subjects, has introduced into his setting a weirdness and gruesomeness that is positively haunting. Some striking and very effective harmonic transitions will prove attractive to musicians, notably at the double-bars.

"Sweet evenings come and go, love," is a pathetic ditty, but possessing a tranquil beauty that is as restful as sleep to tired eyes. The voice part is remarkably grateful to sing and instinct with the tenderness and resignation of the words. The song is intended for a contralto or baritone.

"As the moon's soft splendour" is also designed for contralto or baritone singers. Shelley's well known lines are, in this instance, set in waltz measure; but Mr. Taylor is too great a master of rhythm to permit this to cause monotony, and, well rendered, the song could scarcely fail to please its listeners.

"Elëanore," the last of this distinctive series, is a lover's plaint, and the opening bars of the accompaniment proclaim the passionate despair of the poem. The repetition of the name of his adored one is very cleverly set to enable the singer to impart varied expression, and the passion of the words is accentuated by the sonority and surging character of the accompaniment. A dramatic tenor could make a fine effect with this song in the concert-room.

Variations on an Original Theme. Arranged for Pianoforte solo by the composer, Edward Elgar. Op. 36.

Processional March in E flat. Arranged for Pianoforte solo by the composer, A. C. Mackenzie.

Prelude in C sharp minor. By S. Rachmaninoff. Op. 3, No. 2. Edited by A. Rosenkranz.

Overture to Much Ado about Nothing. By Edward German. Arranged for Pianoforte duet by the composer.

[Novello and Company, Limited.]

Mr. Elgar's remarkably clever Variations were so fully described in The Musical Times for July, subsequent to their first performance at the Richter concert of June 19 last, that it is unnecessary to say more concerning their character. Many pianists will doubtless welcome the arrangement for their instrument, especially as having been made by the composer they may rely upon the salient points of the music having been given due prominence. Viewed as pianoforte pieces, the Variations may be regarded as so many songs without words, each complete in itself and capable of exciting the imagination of the player, and, subject to his or her ability, of that of the listener also.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie's Processional March makes a spirited pianoforte piece, very effective without being by any means difficult of execution.

M. Rachmaninoff's Prelude in C sharp minor is too well known in our concert rooms to need description, but amateurs who would play it may be warmly recommended to become acquainted with this edition, which has been edited by Mr. A. Rosenkranz. Its specialty rests upon being printed with an extra line under the ordinary staves, on which is clearly indicated the proper use of the damper pedal, upon which the effectiveness of the interpretation of this piece greatly depends.

Mr. Edward German's merry Overture to Shakespeare's "Much Ado about Nothing" forms a bright and stirring pianoforte duet. Its executive demands are within the abilities of average pianists.

La Jeunesse. Air de Ballet. By W. J. Kipps.

Fair Rosamund. Intermezzo. By Carl Malemberg.

A Russian Gipsy Dance. By E. Boggetti.

Le Retour. Grande Valse de Concert. By Anton Strelezki. [Edwin Ashdown.]

All these pieces are designed to meet the requirements of amateur pianists whose executive abilities are limited, but who fancy light and tasteful solos. "La Jeunesse" is gay, dainty, and sprightly as youth should be; "Fair Rosamund" is beseemingly graceful; "A Russian Gipsy Dance" is a measure in which the stamping of heels is suggested, and thus it demands forcible accentuation. Grande Valses de Concert have much in common, and that entitled "Le Retour" possesses little to distinguish it from the many others of its class; but the music is showy and effective, and this apparently has been the composer's chief aim.

Sylvan Dances. Composed by Harding Cox.

[Chappell and Co.]

The "Sylvan Dances" comprise four movements, respectively entitled "The Fairy's Revel," "Tarantelle of Gnomes," "Frog's Carillon," and "The Passing Chase." Although modelled on conventional lines, they are tuneful, bright, and gay little pieces, calling for slight executive skill, but lending themselves to tasteful playing.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

Beyond the "Court and Alley concerts," which are giving delight to thousands of the poorer population, and the music in the parks, there is nothing to report from this city. But coming events are casting their shadows before, and the arrangements for the approaching season are taking shape. Choral music, relegated to the background for some years past, will occupy a more prominent position. Abandoning their orchestral concerts, the Festival Choral Society will resume the usual number of choral concerts—namely, four—and among the works to be produced is Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor's "Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast." A new choral organisation will enter the field next season, the Birmingham City Choral Society, which, under the conductorship of Mr. F. W. Beard, will give three concerts. The programmes will include the work by Mr. Taylor just mentioned, Gounod's "St. Cecilia" Mass, and the "Christmas" Oratorio by Saint-Saëns. The Society is established on the lines of similar undertakings in London, having no subscription or sick fund. The chorus will be formed of young voices, and much is expected from the new Society.

Orchestral music, though showing a falling off compared with last season, will occupy an important position. Dr. Winn gives up his series, but there will be two visits of the Manchester orchestra under Dr. Richter. Mr. George J. Halford will commence his third series of ten orchestral concerts on October 31. These promise to be of exceptional interest, and the programmes will offer examples of the Symphony from Haydn to Tschaïkowsky, including one by a British composer, Professor Stanford, who will visit Birmingham to conduct the performance of his "Irish" Symphony.

Messrs. Harrison will give their usual subscription concerts and bring here a brilliant array of artists. Chamber music will be confined apparently to the drawing-room concerts given by Mr. Max Mossel.

The societies that minister to the enjoyment of Saturday night audiences all promise full activity. It is to be hoped that the needed improvements in the various choirs may be carried out, and the good intentions of the conductors thereby be more ably seconded. Of miscellaneous concerts there promises to be no lack.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(From our own Correspondent.)

The series of weekly organ recitals, by various organists, at the Church of St. Thomas, has proved so successful that it is probable a second series will be arranged.

It is proposed to give nine chamber concerts in Clifton next winter. Four of these will be given by Mr. Herbert Parsons in conjunction with Mr. Otto Milani and Mr. H. Walenn. The other five will introduce well known quartet players and soloists from London and elsewhere. The programmes will be on the lines of those of the London Monday and Saturday Popular Concerts. To carry out the scheme a committee has been formed, amongst its members being Dr. Percy Buck, organist of Bristol Cathedral, the Rev. E. H. Fellowes, precentor of the Cathedral, and well known local professionals and amateurs.

It has been arranged to hold a convention, extending over three days, of music teachers, conductors, and others, in the Lecture Theatre of Bristol Museum, during the present month. Mr. W. J. Kidner, conductor of the Society of Bristol Gleemen, is acting as honorary local secretary. Papers will be read and demonstrations given on such subjects as voice culture, chanting, poetry and music, public school music, and school bands.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

The musical season in Glasgow does not start for a month or two yet, but it is already possible to forecast that it will be a fair average in respect of the quality and variety of the entertainment provided by the various concert-givers.

First in rank, of course, is the Choral and Orchestral Union, which provides a high-class orchestra in conjunction with the only important body of local singers, the Choral Union. It proposes, we understand, to carry on operations on virtually the same scale as last year—that is, it will finance a concert scheme of twelve weeks' duration, maintaining an orchestra eighty or so strong, which will give two concerts weekly in Glasgow, and play at less frequent intervals in Edinburgh and other large towns of Scotland. Herr Wilhelm Bruch, of Strassburg, who was the conductor last season, and was, at least, a contributor to the financial success which, for the first time for some years, attended the cause of classical music in Scotland, has been re-engaged, and it is intended to enlist a band of at least equal excellence to that of 1898-99. The entire list of soloists has not yet been fixed, but Busoni, who was one of the favourites of the previous season, is a certainty. The programme of choral music to be performed under the auspices of this body is already arranged. Undeterred by the disappointment which was generally expressed with the result of the French experiment at Leeds, the executive of the Glasgow Union have resolved to produce, for the first time in Great Britain, César Franck's "Beatitudes" —a work which should excite exceptional interest for several reasons beside the fact that French compositions of any kind have had but few hearings of late in Scotland. The other choral works on the list for the coming winter are the "Golden Legend," Brahms's "Song of Destiny," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," the "Walpurgis Night," and the inevitable "Messiah" on New Year's Day.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL AND DISTRICT.

A first performance of Mr. William Wallace's Symphony "The Creation" was the leading feature of the concert at New Brighton Tower, on July 30, when the composer conducted. The symphony is decidedly ambitious. It aims at "depicting the emotion which the contemplation of the theme in its poetical and symbolical meaning is able to awaken." The leading idea being unity of design, the entire work is based on one theme, and it has been an aim of the composer that the various subjects should be closely related without their individuality being sacrificed. A distinct success attended this first hearing, for the composition proved virile and dramatic, displaying great command of orchestral resource, well-marked idealism, and symmetrical form. Judging by the remaining pieces of the programme, boldness appears to be Mr. Wallace's chief characteristic. His weird symphonic poem, based on D. G. Rossetti's "Sister Helen," afforded a good example of his daring treatment of a subject in itself gruesome. Another symphonic poem, "The Passing of Beatrice," is remarkable for the beautiful modulations which, towards its close, depict the change from material to ethereal being. Mr. Bantock Pierpoint sang a selection of the composer's Border Ballads.

This interesting concert was followed, on the 6th ult., by one illustrative of Tschaïkowsky. Mr. Granville Bantock, who conducted, included in his selection the tragic fantasia "Francesca da Rimini," based upon the story, well known to readers of Dante, of Paolo and Francesca. The fantasia shows Tschaïkowsky's genius in an impressive light. While what may be called the Francesca subject is given out by the wood-wind, with interludes of the more virile Paolo motive on the brass, the strings take up a succession of despairing wailings, which become more and more insistent, agitated, and apparently confused, while from time to time extraordinary moaning gusts sweep through the orchestra. This climax is succeeded by a long diminuendo, as though the horrors of the Inferno were being left behind. There is a momentary outburst, and then the music dies down to quite tragic silence. In executing this tour de force both orchestra and conductor acquitted themselves with the greatest credit. The stirring "1812" Overture, depicting the overthrow of the Grande Armée, brought to a close a concert that included the now familiar "Pathetic" Symphony and the Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, in which the solo part was played by Miss Margie Bennett with incisiveness and distinction.

On the 14th ult., at the "British" concert, a place was given to Dr. Joseph Bridge's "Chester" Symphony, which, it may be remembered, was produced at the Chester Festival, 1894. Mr. G. W. Black, a member of the orchestra, conducted an Intermezzo of his own composition, entitled "The Sylphs." It proved pretty and ingenious, and the young musician was honoured by a hearty recall. Sullivan's introduction to "The Tempest"; Hamish MacCunn's weirdly imaginative "Ship o' the Fiend," and some interesting musical recitations by Stanley Hawley and H. M. Higgs were also heard, the reciter being Mr. Charles Fry, who is very well known in Liverpool.

MUSIC IN NOTTINGHAM.

Arrangements for the approaching season are already coming to hand. The earliest fixture is a pianoforte recital on October 5, by Miss Smith, a highly promising débutante at present studying at the Hoch Schule, Berlin. The programme will include works by Bach, Beethoven, Brahms, Chopin, Schumann, and Mendelssohn.

The prospectus of the forty-fourth season of the Nottingham Sacred Harmonic Society presents its patrons with some pieces of considerable interest. The season will open on November 9 with Gounod's "Faust," which, though an old favourite and rather overdone, should prove attractive with Miss Lilian Blauvelt as Margarita and Mr. Ellison van Hoose as Faust. At the second concert Goring Thomas's "Swan and the Skylark," and excerpts from "Rheingold" and "Lohengrin" will be given, and the season will conclude with Saint-Saëns's "Samson et Dalilah," "The Messiah" being given as usual on Boxing day.

Despite the adverse results, from a pecuniary point of view, of the orchestral concerts last season, the Society again ventures to present two programmes, with Mrs. Henry J. Wood as vocalist at the first and Mr. Louis Fröhlich at the second, on which occasion the programme will be devoted to the works of Wagner. All this, under the direction of Mr. Henry J. Wood, should prove acceptable to the lovers of the art in Nottingham.

The prospectus of the Harrison concerts, though not yet to hand, will be on the familiar popular lines.

At the Midsummer examination of the Royal College of Organists, the following candidates were successful:—

Fellows:—W. E. Haslam (Winchcombe), W. G. Hopkins (Rochester), B. Lofthouse (Southport), A. Lyne (Ramsgate), D. Parkes (Plymouth), V. G. Rivers (Reading), E. C. Robinson (Lincoln), W. B. Ross (Edinburgh), P. W. Taylor (Peterborough), A. W. V. Vine (London), J. H. Willan (St. Albans).

Associates:—E. C. Bishop and A. Carrick (London), W. T. Clements (Lees), Miss M. Cliff (Grantham), H. J. H. Connett (Haywards Heath), H. Cooper (Sheffield), T. B. Croxall (Church Gresley), H. Dean (Liversedge), F. G. Dyer (Cheltenham), C. Egan (Manchester), W. Every and W. J. Hammet (London), A. Hands (Bedford), J. R. Kennerell (Hertford), G. E. Lindley (Lytham), Miss E. L. Montague (Goring), S. Mumford, W. J. Piercy, and H. S. Plummer (London), C. E. Richards (Ealing), W. A. Richards (New Barnet), W. D. Saunders (Plymouth), S. V. Sherwood (London), J. T. Smith (St. David's), W. E. Taylor (Radcliffe), H. S. Trevitt (Lincoln), W. T. Upsher (London), W. S. Vale (Hillingdon), H. Whittaker, C. W. Wilson, and Miss E. M. Williams (London), J. A. Yardley (Brighton).

Two exhibitions for violin playing, the funds for which have been raised by Mr. Hans Wessely, will come into operation at the Royal Academy of Music at Michaelmas. The exhibitions are each of the value of £25 per annum and are tenable for three years, the amounts being devoted towards the payment of the fees of the holders thereof. They are open to male and female candidates under seventeen years of age on the day of the competition.

Candidates must not be, nor must ever have been, pupils of the Royal Academy of Music. The first competition will be held at that Institution on the 23rd inst. Candidates will be required to play the first movement of Rode's Seventh Concerto in A minor (Peters' edition) or such portion thereof as the examiners may require, a piece of their own selection, and a piece at first sight. Applications should be sent to the secretary not later than the 16th inst.

At the Alexandra Palace a spirited performance of "Elijah" took place on July 29. The Alexandra Palace Choral Society did remarkably well, the rendering of the Baal choruses, of "Thanks be to God," and of other choral numbers lacking neither impressiveness, vigour, nor regard for expression. It was a pity that only so poor an accompaniment as that of pianoforte and organ should have been provided; at times, indeed, the former instrument could not be heard at all. The title-part was sustained, with his accustomed success, by Mr. Watkin Mills, the other soloists being Mesdames Medora Henson, Edith Leslie, Minnie Jones, and Annie Oblein, Messrs. Herbert Grover, A. T. Johns, and Harry Long. Mr. George Riseley conducted with tact and decision.

Mr. W. Sims, organist of St. Cross, Holywell, Oxford, on the occasion of his marriage early in last month, received most gratifying proofs of the high estimation in which he is held. He received handsome presents of silver from the clergy and choir and also from the congregation. Both presentations were made within the walls of the church, and Mr. Sims was congratulated upon having been for twenty-six years organist to the parish. Appreciative allusion was also made to the efficiency of the choir. The music in St. Cross, though always of an unobtrusive and simple character, is rendered with such care and religious feeling as to make the services models of what parochial services should be.

The London diocesan branch of the Church of England Temperance Society is among the institutions making a creditable show every summer on the Handel Orchestra at the Crystal Palace. Four thousand children assembled at the sixth annual festival, held on July 29, when a number of bright and simple pieces were sung with a sustained steadiness, animation, and volume of tone that spoke well for the training they had received. Particularly successful features of a programme that evidently alike gratified listeners and performers were "Merrily sped the mill-wheel" and "Hear the mighty music."

Musical interest will, as usual, not be wanting in Mr. Charles Fry's Costume Recitals, which will be resumed early next month, when "Macbeth," with Clement Locknane's incidental music; the "Merchant of Venice," with Sullivan's masque music; and "Henry the Fourth" (Part I.) will be given. The music will be performed by members of the London Organ School Orchestra and Chorus, under the direction of Dr. Yorke Trotter; and the Serenade in the "Merchant of Venice" will be sung by Mr. H. Lane Wilson.

The twenty-sixth annual festival of the London Church Choir Association will be held, on November 16, in St. Paul's Cathedral. The entire musical arrangements will be under the direction of Sir George C. Martin. The anthem will be Smart's "Lord, Thou hast been our refuge," composed for the sixth annual festival in 1878; the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, Martin in B flat; and, at the conclusion of the service, "The Heavens are telling," from Haydn's "Creation," will be performed.

In our notice of the choral contest at Whitby, on p. 557 of our August issue, the Crosland Choir (which, by the way, should have been Crosland Hill Choir) was mentioned as one of the prize-winners. We regret that, through the error of our correspondent, this was a misstatement, and the choir which should have been included instead among the prize-winners was the Eastbrook (Bradford) Choir.

A testimonial in the shape of a diamond pendant has been presented to Miss Emily Shinner (Mrs. Liddle) by some musical friends in recognition of her gifts as a violinist.

The twenty-fifth meeting of the International Association of Literature and Art will be held from the 23rd to the 30th inst., at Heidelberg. The proceedings are likely to be of exceptional interest, a great number of papers bearing upon the legal aspects of the Society's interests, the copyright question, and other subjects, having already been placed upon the agenda.

The Triennial Handel Festival next year is announced to take place at the Crystal Palace as follows: On Friday, June 15, General Rehearsal; Monday, June 18, "Messiah"; Wednesday, June 20, Selection; and Friday, June 22, "Israel in Egypt."

Mr. Joseph E. Deacon has been appointed hon. local representative at Cardiff of the Royal Academy of Music, in place of the late Mr. F. P. Atkins.

FOREIGN NOTES.

Antwerp.—Flemish national opera is about to have a permanent home in this town, the Municipality having purchased the theatre in the Rue de Jésu, hitherto used as a circus, with that object in view.

Bayreuth.—The thirteenth anniversary of the death of Franz Liszt was commemorated at the villa "Wahnfried," on July 30, by a musical performance at which only a few intimate friends of the house and special admirers of the great pianist-composer had been invited to assist. Amongst the artists taking part were Herr Carl Prill, the violinist; Herr E. Reuss, the pianist; Court-capellmeister Pohlig, and the vocalists, Fräulein Johanna Dietz and Herr Gerhäuser.

Berlin.—The revival, occasioned by the death of Johann Strauss, of "Die Fledermaus," at the New Royal Opera House, has proved a success almost unprecedented in Berlin. The fiftieth performance was recorded on July 25, and the charming work continues to be given four times a week to overflowing houses. It is not surprising, therefore, that it should be proposed to bring out one or two other works by the Viennese master at the Royal establishment, where operetta has been hitherto almost an entire stranger. It is interesting to note, moreover, and favourably reflecting upon the taste of an audience reputed blasé, that Mozart's evergreen "Die Zauberflöte" is having a complete "run" at the West-end Theater, where the work has been very satisfactorily mounted. Some successful performances of Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" have likewise been given at this house last month.—A new and important orchestral concert undertaking is to be added, in the approaching season, to those already existing in this capital; it will be under the management of Mr. Loewenstein, formerly the impresario of the Anton Seidl concerts, in New York. An orchestra of 100 members has been engaged, and amongst the conductors will be Herren Zumpe and Mahler, Signor Mascagni, M. Lamoureux, and Dr. Richter. The concerts, which will be given at the Kroll Hall, are to commence in the course of next month.——The committee of the projected Berlin Wagner Monument has been guaranteed, by an anonymous admirer of the master, the amount of balance that may remain short of the £15,000 required after the subscription lists have been closed.

Como.—Don Lorenzo Perosi's new oratorio "The Nativity of Christ" is to be produced for the first time on the 12th inst., and to be performed on five subsequent days, in the Cathedral of this town, under the composer's direction, and with an orchestra and choir numbering some 380 executants.

Dresden.—Paderewski's long-expected opera, on a Polish subject, will, it is said, at length be brought out at the Royal Theatre in November next, after which the distinguished pianist-composer has arranged for the production of the work in the United States during his impending visit there.

Düsseldorf.—A highly impressive performance of "Egmont," with the whole of Beethoven's incidental music, was given at the Municipal Theatre last month, the representation forming part of the cycle of Goethe's dramas which has just been taking place here in celebration of the 150th anniversary of the great poet's birth.

Frankfort-on-Main.—Eugene d'Albert has completed a violoncello concerto, which is said to be a very valuable addition to the by no means plentiful répertoire for that sympathetic instrument. The work has been dedicated to Herr Hugo Becker, and will be first played by him during the coming season.

Geneva.—The vacant professorship of French and Italian singing at the Conservatoire has been conferred upon Madame Teresa Brambilla-Ponchielli, a distinguished vocalist, and widow of the composer of "I Promessi Sposi."

Leipzig.—The management of the Gewandhaus Orchestra has lately received the munificent donation of £1,500, the interest of which is to be distributed annually amongst the necessitous members of that admirable body of instrumentalists. The donor is Mr. Kissel, a merchant of Manchester.

Mannheim.—A musical academy, after the pattern of the Berlin Hochschule für Musik and under a similar denomination, is being founded here, with a sufficient fund to ensure its financial stability. An efficient staff of professors has already been engaged, and the new institution is to be opened shortly.——In accordance with a very laudable resolution recently passed by the Municipal Council, a series of performances, chiefly of classical works, is to be given annually in future at the Court Theatre (distinguished from similar German institutions by the title of "Hof und National Theater") at the trifling sum of 40 pfennig for admission.

Milan.—According to present arrangements, the first novelty during the coming season of La Scala will be Signor Puccini's "La Tosca," with Madame Darclée in the titular part, to be followed by Tschaïkowsky's "Eugène Oneguin," while Signor Mancinelli's "Ero e Leandro" will probably also be given.——At the Lirico, Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie" is in course of being mounted, the performances commencing about the middle of next month, and a further tribute is to be paid to French operatic art by the production, in the following month, of Massenet's "Cendrillon."——Signor Leoncavallo is suffering from inflammation of the eyes, which, it is feared, will prevent his undertaking any serious work for some time to come.

Munich.—The annual special performances of Wagner operas at the Royal Theatre commenced on July 31 with "Die Feen," in which Frau Fraenkel-Claus, the successor at the royal establishment of Fräulein Ternina, was accorded a highly favourable reception. The series also included performances of Siegfried Wagner's "Der Bärenhäuter" and Heinrich Vogl's "Der Fremdling."——Max Joseph Beer's new one-act opera, "The Blacksmiths' Strike," has been brought out at the Gärtnerplatz Theatre with considerable success, the work, both as regards music and libretto, containing numerous elements of true popularity.

Naples.—The death centenary of Domenico Cimarosa, the composer of "Il Matrimonio Segreto," is to be commemorated in a worthy manner and on a large scale at his native Aversa, where a statue of the master is to be unveiled and performances extending over several days are to take place. The Naples Conservatorio, where Cimarosa was a pupil, will lend its active co-operation, and an influential committee, with the veteran Verdi as its president, is engaged in arranging the preliminaries.

Nordhausen.—The bi-centenary of the birth of Christian Gottlieb Schröter, the reputed inventor of the "Hammer Clavier," was celebrated, on the 19th ult., by an interesting and numerously attended musical soirée. Schröter was organist at Nordhausen from 1732 to 1780. His invention of the hammer mechanism for the clavier (or pianoforte), according to his own testimony, dates from the year 1717, but before he was in a position to practically carry out his ideas he was anticipated by a similar invention of Cristofori, of Florence, in 1719.

Paris.—The Orphéon of the City of Paris, which was founded by Gounod under the Second Empire, but dissolved some twenty-five years ago, has been successfully re-organised, under the auspices of MM. Chupuis, Inspector-General of musical instruction, and Bedorez, director of school singing, and gave some very creditable performances, under the conductorship of the former, at the Cirque d'Hiver last month. The choir consists of 1,200 voices (men, women, and children), and is to be made a special feature during next year's Exhibition. A novel feature at the latter will also be the proposed International Congress on Musical History, as a sectional division of a General Congress on Comparative History, and of which MM. Saint-Saëns and Tiersot are the presidents of committee.——M. Camille Saint-Saëns has just returned from his most successful visit to Brazil, where he conducted a series of concerts both in the capital and at São Paulo.——At the Grand Opéra, Reyer's "Salammbo" and Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie" are in active preparation, while at the Opéra Comique, which will re-open next month, M. Saint-Saëns's "Javotte" and Gustave Charpentier's "Louise" will be the first novelties.

Pesaro.—Mascagni is engaged upon the score of a new opera, "Vestilia," the libretto by Targioni and Menasci (who also wrote that of "Cavalleria Rusticana"); the composer having laid aside for the present the score of another work, "Le Maschere," which he had commenced. The new libretto, which includes a contest of gladiators, is said to present some highly sensational features.

Prague.—Much interest is being created in musical circles by the forthcoming complete cycle of Smetana's operas, which has been for some time in preparation at the National Theatre. The works of the popular Czech composer will be produced in chronological order, and a number of prominent singers of Bohemian nationality, engaged at various German and Austrian lyrical establishments, will take part in the cycle—notably Mesdames Foerster-Lauterer (Hamburg) and Burrian (Berlin), MM. Hesch (Vienna) and Kroupa (Stuttgart).

Rome.—An undertaking of considerable interest and importance is the approaching inauguration in this capital of a School of Church Music, for which the services of a staff of eminent professors have been secured. The organ classes will be conducted by Signor Capocci, organist of St. John of the Lateran; Baron Kanzler will occupy the chair of musical history, and M. Janssens that of Gregorian chant; while Don Lorenzo Perosi will direct the composition classes. A number of pupils have already inscribed their names for admission to the new Institution.

Scheveningen.—The Berlin Philharmonic Orchestra, under the direction of Herr Rebiceck, is giving its annual series of symphony concerts at the Kurhaus just now to enormous audiences. Amongst the interesting works produced here for the first time by that excellent body of instrumentalists may be instanced the "Symphonic Variations" by Dvorák, the symphonic poem "Vasantasena," by Halvorsen, and a prelude to Legouvé's tragedy "Medée," by the Netherlandish composer, Gottfried Mann, all of these meeting with a full share of appreciation. A three days' "festival" was announced to take place at the end of last month, to celebrate the fifteenth anniversary of the Berlin orchestra's performances at the Kurhaus, Signor Busoni and Madame Marcella Pregi having promised their co-operation.

Vienna.—The Imperial Opera re-opened its doors after the vacation, on the 1st ult., with a performance of Gounod's "Faust." The one hundredth performance of "I Pagliacci" was recorded here on the 9th ult., and, a few days later, the two hundredth of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Goldmark's opera "Merlin," which has not been given for some years past, for want of a suitable representative of the heroine, is about to be revived at the Opera. The work has in the meantime been completely overhauled by its composer, and some important alterations have been made in the score. A new operetta, "Der Landstreicher," the music by C. M. Ziehrer, was brought out at the Theater-an-der-Wien, on July 29, with very great success, which has been fully sustained in subsequent performances.——At the recent annual examinations of the Conservatorium, the exceptionally great number of gifted pupils, particularly in the pianoforte classes, was generally remarked upon. The first prize, which includes the gift of a superb pianoforte on the part of Herr Boesendorfer, was awarded to Herr Wilhelm Klasen, a pupil of Robert Fischhof, for pianoforte playing. The number of pupils at the Conservatorium (which was founded in 1817) during the past academical year was 729.——The committee of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde have decided to institute a "Johann Strauss Fund," in aid of talented young musicians.

OBITUARY.

Truro has lost a much respected citizen and worthy benefactor in the person of Edward Goodridge Heard, who died at St. Ives, Cornwall, while on a visit to that place, on July 17. Mr. Heard, who was born at Truro in 1819, began early in life to take a warm interest in public affairs. For considerably over half-a-century he had been a member of the Corporation of his native city, and at his death was its senior member and Alderman. He was for a long period chairman of the Public Works Committee, Mayor of the city in 1872-3, an Alderman on the County Council, and a Magistrate of many years' standing. Throughout his business life he was associated with the West Briton newspaper—first as manager, then as part proprietor, and subsequently as sole proprietor. The deceased gentleman, who was interested in many important business undertakings, was head of the firm of Messrs. Heard and Sons, musicsellers, Truro. His memory is perpetuated by the Waterfall Gardens, presented by him to his native city some years ago, and which is one of the most ornamental features in the western part of the Cornish capital.

Bishop Lloyd, late of Bangor, died on the 4th ult., in his fifty-fifth year. In addition to his many eminent qualities, he was an enthusiastic lover of music, and was greatly beloved throughout the diocese and the Principality generally. His enthusiasm for music was very great, and he had but recently published "Emyniadur yr Eglwys yn Nghymru" (The Hymnary of the Church in Wales), the most important collection of hymns and tunes that the Welsh Church possesses. He was buried at Llanarth, Cardiganshire, his native place, and a choir of 100 voices which took part in the funeral service (the members being drawn from every place of worship in the neighbourhood) testified to the general esteem in which the deceased was held.

We have also to record the death of Mr. E. W. Thomas, organist, Bangor, North Wales, in his sixtieth year, an unobtrusive but painstaking and much-respected musician, who filled the post of organist at St. Anne's Church, Bethesda, for forty years. He was also organist and Past Master of St. David's Lodge, and Past Grand organist of the Provincial Grand Lodge of North Wales.

Pierre De Mol, a composer of considerable merit and member of a noted family of musicians, died at Alost, on July 22, at the age of seventy-four. Born at Brussels in 1825, he gained the Premier Prix de Rome, at the Brussels Conservatoire, with a cantata, "Le dernier jour d'Herculanum," and subsequently was appointed chapelmaster at the Church of St. Martin and director of the Ecole de Musique, at Alost, which posts he occupied until his death.

The death is announced, on July 26, at Berlin, of Professor Emil Breslaur, one of the leading pianoforte teachers in the German capital, and well known also as a musical author. He was born at Cottbus, in 1836, and originally devoted himself to the ministry in the Jewish community of his native town, but eventually studied music at Berlin, was appointed to a professorship for pianoforte and harmony at Kullak's Academy, and also became choral director at the Reformed Synagogue, in succession to J. Stern. In 1879 he founded his excellent "Seminary for pianoforte-playing," which has rendered his name and method so widely known.

The Swedish composer, Siegfried Salomon, died at Stockholm, on July 28, aged eighty-three. He was the composer of the national opera "Tordenskjold," and, at the invitation of Liszt, conducted his successful comic opera "Das Corps der Rache," at Weimar, in 1850.

With Privy Councillor Dr. Carl Gille, whose death, at the advanced age of eighty-six, occurred on the 6th ult., at Ilmenau, one of the most highly esteemed and interesting personalities connected with German artistic society has passed away. For many years the very active honorary secretary of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, he was also an intimate friend and admirer of Liszt, in whose honour he founded the Liszt Museum, at Weimar, of which he was the director.

CORRESPONDENCE.

PITCH AT ETON: A WISE DECISION.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—It may interest some of your readers to know that all the pianofortes in the music rooms at Eton are in future to be tuned to the low ("New Philharmonic") pitch, and that this pitch will henceforth be used at the practices and concerts of the School Musical Society.

Yours faithfully,
C. H. Lloyd.

THE SWALEDALE TOURNAMENT OF SONG.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Thank you for so kindly noticing the "Swaledale Tournament of Song" in the August Musical Times. I am writing to say that at our last Committee meeting it was thought advisable to postpone the competition until the Spring of next year, on account of the date chosen being found inconvenient to country choirs. All further information will be willingly supplied at any time by the hon. secretaries at the address below.—Yours truly,

Charlotte Yeoman.

AN APPEAL FOR HELP.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

Sir,—Every Saturday evening, from September to June, we give evening concerts for our working people in our Mission Room, Canterbury Road, Old Kent Road, but often find a difficulty in obtaining performers. May we appeal through your columns in the hope that some of your musical readers may be willing to help us? We should be most grateful if any such would communicate with the Secretary of our Temperance Society, Mr. A. F. Penfold, 73, Canterbury Road, Old Kent Road.

Yours, &c.,
W. W. Hough,
Missioner.

[As on previous occasions, we cordially commend this appeal to the attention of our readers.—Ed., M.T.]

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY AND COLONIAL NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

Builth.—On the 7th ult. the Builth and District Harmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The choir (which has won many laurels at Eisteddfodau since 1894) numbered 150 voices, and there was a small orchestra of about twenty performers, all from the locality, assisted by Miss Agnes Price (pianoforte) and Mr. Robert Henry (organ). The choruses were sung with excellent intonation and vigorous attack, and the performance throughout reflected much credit on the conductor, Mr. Evan Evans. The solo vocalists were Madame Clara Leighton, Miss Laura Owen, and Mr. William Davies.

Georgetown (British Guiana).—Gaul's cantata "The Holy City" was performed in St. Andrew's Church, on the 1st ult., by a choir under the direction of Mr. A. Smellie. The accompaniments were played by an orchestra (leader, Miss Gilzean), with Mr. G. W. Nusum at the organ. The performance was on the whole creditable, although the choir would have benefited by further rehearsal and the orchestra was at times a little too loud—a by no means uncommon occurrence. The solo parts were sung by Misses Fairbairn, Solomon, Drysdale, Weber, and Mrs. F. White; Messrs. W. G. Smellie, A. Collier, and R. P. Stewart.

LOWESTOFT.—In aid of the choir fund of St. John's Church, Stainer's cantata "The Daughter of Jairus" was successfully performed in the church, on the evening of July 24. The soloists were Masters Gordon Bennett and H. Bailey, Mr. G. B. Rix and Mr. J. A. Cleathero, the choruses being given by the choir.

SYDNEY (N.S.W.)—The St. Cecilia Choir gave a concert on June 5, at the Masonic Hall, in aid of the fund to establish a scholarship to the memory of their former conductor, the late Miss Ethel C. Pedley. The chief feature of the evening was the performance, for the third time, of Miss G. M. Woolley's cantata "The Captive Soul" (the lyrics to which were written by Miss Pedley). The singing of the choir was excellent, and the accompaniments were ably played on the pianoforte and organ by Miss Grace Hall and Mr. Joseph Massey. The solo parts were effectively sung by Miss Edith King, Miss Kathleen Morven, Miss E. Russell, and Mr. Percy Bates. The composer, who has taken the place of Miss Pedley as conductor of the Society, directed the performance.——On June 15 the Philharmonic Society gave a performance of "Israel in Egypt," in the Town Hall. The chorus and orchestra were augmented specially for the occasion, and, under Signor Hazon's direction, a signal success was the result. The great organ, played by M. Wiegand, was an important adjunct. The chorus was prompt in attack and powerful, and the orchestra, especially the strings, admirable.——The Pleyel Concert Company has entered on the third season of its excellent chamber concerts. Herr Stael is principal violin; Herr Vollmar, violoncello; and Mr. Beaupuis, pianoforte.——An excellent concert was given in the Town Hall, on July 6, by the Sydney Amateur Orchestral Society, under Signor Hazon. Wagner's "Ride of the Walkyries"—its first performance here—was the chief feature of the programme, which included Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto in A—also for the first time here—(with Herr Vollmar as soloist), the Allegretto from Beethoven's Seventh Symphony, the Overture to "Oberon," two movements from Goldmark's "Rustic Wedding" Symphony, Liszt's Rhapsodie Hongroise (No. 4), and a composition, "Canti di Giubilo," by the conductor. The vocalist was Miss Narelle.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Charles Davies, Organist and Choirmaster to Fullarton Free Church, Irvine, N.B.—Mr. Joseph E. Deacon, Organist and Choirmaster to Congregational Church, Charles Street, Cardiff.—Mr. Frederick William Harnack, Organist and Choirmaster to All Saints' Church, Springfield, Essex.—Mr. G. W. Nusum, City Organist to the Town Hall, Georgetown, Demerara.—Mr. Henry Graves to the New Parish Church, Ayr.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Ashbridge Miller (Principal Tenor), to St. Stephen's Church, Gateacre, Liverpool.—Mr. John Key (Bass), to Magdalen College, Oxford.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. M.—(1) For teaching pieces to follow Clementi's Sonatinas try Mozart's easy Sonata in C, the two Sonatas of Beethoven in his Op. 49, and his easy variations; also some of Hummel's and Dussek's easy pieces. For lighter pieces (which are very desirable) see simple compositions by Wilm, Reinecke (both in Peters' edition), and Tschaïkowsky. We will gladly give you further suggestions upon application. (2) Mr. Franklin Taylor's Primer on Pianoforte Playing (Macmillan) is invaluable to every teacher.

"WOTAN."—(1) Yes, Wagner's "Ring" cycle is published with English words (the translation by H. and F. Corder) by Messrs. Schott and Co. (2) Vincent Wallace's "Lurline" is published by W. Paxton, Oxford Street.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

⁂ Notices of Concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded to us immediately after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot possibly be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

MADAME CONWAY

(SOPRANO VOCALIST AND TEACHER OF SINGING).

MADAME CONWAY'S FIRST TOUR IN IRELAND.

Opinions of the Press.

"Messiah."—"Madame Conway, in her opening recitatives, secured the undivided attention of the audience, and this she continued to hold until her concluding item. She possesses a voice of exceptional sweetness and power, which, combined with perfect training, entitles her to rank, as she does, amongst leading vocalists. All her items were much appreciated, and if any exception could be made for perfect rendering it seemed to be in 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' which was sung by her with pathos and feeling, completely enchanting her audience."—Ulster Gazette, Armagh, December 18, 1898.

"Messiah."—"Madame Conway, who possesses a rich soprano voice of great range and power, sang the numbers allotted to her with beguiling sympathy and sweetness, her grand voice ringing through the hall with marvellous effect. The great vocal beauty and expression which characterised all her efforts, and more especially her interpretation of 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' lent a charm to the numbers that was in the highest sense enjoyable, and the hall re-echoed the prolonged plaudits of her delighted and enchanted hearers."—Ballymena Weekly Telegraph, December 17, 1898.

"Messiah."—"Madame Conway's well-cultured voice was heard to advantage in 'Rejoice greatly' and 'I know that my Redeemer liveth,' and the various other items which fell to her lot received a most artistic rendering. Never before have the inhabitants of Portadown had the opportunity of listening to such a high-class musical treat in their own town."—Portadown News, December 17, 1898.

"Madame Conway's magnificent soprano voice was heard to great advantage in three solos: 'When you forget' (Bonheur), 'Should he upbraid' (Bishop), and ''Mid the hush of the corn' (Temple). Her vocalism is of a very high order, and the rich flexibility of her voice delighted an unusually critical and aristocratic audience."—Derry Standard, December 19, 1898.

Address, 444, Moss Lane East, Oxford Street, Manchester.

NOVELLO'S
VILLAGE CHANT BOOK
No. II.
CONTAINING
50 DOUBLE CHANTS.

Price Sixpence.

The Chants contained in the above collections have been chosen for their attractive melody and simple harmonies. A special feature is the pitch of the reciting-note, which in no chant exceeds C natural.* The requirements and capabilities of Village Choirs have been carefully considered in making the selection, which it is hoped will materially aid an important part of Divine Service.

* One exception to this occurs in No. II., Chant No. 23, by Lord Mornington, which is included on account of its great popularity

RUTH

SUITABLE FOR USE IN PLACES OF WORSHIP

WORDS BY

EDWARD OXENFORD

MUSIC BY

ALFRED R. GAUL.

SUITABLE FOR

THANKSGIVING SERVICES.

"The Biblical story of which Ruth is the central figure lends itself with remarkable suitability to an illustration of a harvest celebration. The country landscape, the ripened corn, the sturdy reapers, the standing sheaves, the active gleaners, and the busy farmer, all combine to fill the mind's eye with a pleasant scene of excitement. Set to music by a competent composer such as Mr. A. R. Gaul, the narrative of Ruth's eventual episode lends itself to a pathetic, picturesque, and pleasant performance. The bereaved and sorrowful trio of women on whom the calamity of poverty and famine has fallen, as if to give intensity to their greater grief, and the unexpected and happy influence of patriarchal benevolence displayed by the mighty Boaz, who so quickly transforms sorrow into joy, are all introduced and aptly take their allotted place in the melodious music of Gaul's interpretation of the tale."—Gloucester Citizen.

PERFORMED IN THE TOWN HALL, BIRMINGHAM, ON TWELVE OCCASIONS.

CHURCH CHOIR CHANT-BOOK

A COMPLETE SET OF CHANTS ADAPTED TO THE BOOK OF PSALMS

AND

L. S. TUCKWELL, M.A.

RECTOR OF STANDLAKE, FORMERLY PRECENTOR OF THE SAME COLLEGE.

PREFACE.

Care has been taken in this Collection to make use of those Chants only whose reciting notes are well within the compass of ordinary voices. To all the voice-parts attention has been paid in this respect. But some beautiful and useful Chants which do not fulfil these conditions have been either given as alternatives or placed in the Appendix.

Due consideration has been given to the sequence of key in successive Chants. A separate Chant has been assigned to each of the 150 Psalms, two or three to the longer Psalms, such as 78th and 89th, one to each section of the 119th, and one to the Venite for each morning of the month, making in all, with the Appendix, 276 different Chants. Any of these may be used for the Canticles, but, generally speaking, a single Chant will be found most suitable for the Magnificat, and a double chant for the Benedictus and Nunc dimittis. In the Te Deum the following arrangement is suggested: a single chant for verses 1—13, a double chant for verses 14—25, and a single chant for verses 26 to end. The division of the words of the Te Deum, as suggested above, is that which has already been adopted in the Cathedral Psalter. The Benedicite may be sung to three single chants, a change being made at v. 18 and v. 27. The appropriation of each Chant to its particular Psalm has not been made experimentally; in a large number of cases, the Chants have been sung for many years to the very Psalms to which they are here attached, to the satisfaction and edification of choirs with which the Editors have been associated. As there are many who desire to have only one Chant associated with each Psalm, the same Chants are given for the thirtieth and thirty-first days; but an alternative set for the use of those who desire a change will be found in the Appendix.

THE MUSIC COMPOSED FOR THREE SOLO VOICES, CHORUS, & ORCHESTRA

BY

JOHN MORE SMIETON.

Vocal Score, 2s. 6d.
Full Score and Band Parts on hire.

(The work takes about Eighty Minutes to perform, and is adapted for Festival and the larger Choral Societies.)

"Space prevents us from noticing in detail this interesting work The music, in which Scandinavian influence is perceptible, is fresh and imaginative. There is a great variety of rhythm; and the epithet 'dramatic' in the title is quite appropriate."—The Musical Times.

"A new work of real power and grit is John More Smieton's Cantata 'Connla.' . . . The music flows natural and transparent, as do the words; and, taken altogether, the work is admirable in the arrangement of its matter and the clearness of its treatment. Conductors and choirmasters should not fail to procure copies of this new and distinctly notable production."—Musical Opinion.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

*UNA

Sixth and Seventh Thousand.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL, OCTOBER 4, 1893.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

†THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Eleventh and Twelfth Thousand.
This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

*JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Twenty-sixth to Thirtieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

Fifth and Sixth Thousand.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

*ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

FREDERICK CHOPIN

AS A MAN AND MUSICIAN

BY

FREDERICK NIECKS.

Ce beau génie est moins un musicien qu'une âme qui se rend sensible.—H. de Balzac.

IN TWO VOLUMES, CLOTH, GILT, PRICE TWENTY-FIVE SHILLINGS.
With a Portrait, etched by H. R. Robertson, and Fac-similes of the Composer's MS.

EXTRACTS FROM PREFACE.

My guiding principle has been to place before the reader the facts collected by me as well as the conclusions at which I arrived. This will enable him to see the subject in all its bearings, with all its pros and cons, and to draw his own conclusions should mine not obtain his approval.

Whatever the defects of the present volumes may be—and, no doubt, they are both great and many—I have laboured to the full extent of my humble abilities to group and present my material perspicuously, and to avoid diffuseness and rhapsody, those besetting sins of writers on music.

My researches had for their object the whole life of Chopin and his historical, political, artistical, social, and personal surroundings, but they were chiefly directed to the least known and most interesting period of his career—his life in France, and his visits to Germany and Great Britain. My chief sources of information are divisible into two classes—newspapers, magazines, pamphlets, correspondences, and books; and conversations I held with, and letters I received from Chopin's pupils, friends, and acquaintances.

Prefixed to the first volume of the present biography the reader will find one of the portraits by Kwiatkowski, an etching after a charming pencil drawing in my possession, the reproduction of which the artist has kindly permitted.

"The two volumes are so rich in absolutely new facts concerning Chopin's life, and so valuable in interesting and, for the most part, unprejudiced analytical comments upon the composer's works, that in the future we may reasonably expect the book to be frequently quoted whenever the writings of the 'Ariel of the pianoforte' are in question. To the large majority of readers, however, the true story—told with all the evidence that can be collected from letters and from the reports of onlookers to support the truth—of the romantic love of the pianist-composer for the eminent novelist, Madame George Sand, will be of the supremest interest. Nearly 200 pages are devoted to this episode, which was not only the most momentous incident of Chopin's career, but which also practically broke his heart and led to his early death. . . . The volumes likewise contain a full list of Chopin's works, an index, an etching from one of the portraits by Kwiatkowski (so different from the glorified drawing by Ary Scheffer), and a fac-simile of Chopin's delicate penmanship from one of the 'Etudes,' which, with the preludes, mazourkas, waltzes, polonaises, and the rest, are a great deal more popular in English drawing-rooms now than they were at the date of the composer's death, a few months short of forty years ago."—Daily News.

"Mr. Niecks's work at once takes its place among standard biographies of Great Musicians—the first complete and wholly satisfactory life of Chopin that has been written. Mr. Niecks may be assured that its successful achievement places him in the front rank of musical biographers; while, at the same time, the production of so able and adequate a work adds one more to the laurels earned by the distinguished firm that has already given us in English form Otto Jahn's 'Mozart' and Spitta's 'Bach.'"—Sunday Times.

"It is an admirable, well-contrived, and interesting biography, in which one of the most important items is formed by Chopin's own letters. . . . How the work is brought out is said in two words: it is published by Novello & Co. That is sufficient guarantee."—The World.
